P&G to unveil refill packs

By Laurie Freeman

Procter & Gamble Co., in the first of several environmental initiatives planned through 1990, is scheduled to unveil the U.S. introduction of a refill package for cleaning products.

P&G will hold a press conference in Washington Nov. 15 to announce the development. The refill package for a single product will be tested in the Baltimore/-Washington area.

The packaging concept has been very successful in international markets. Since 1988, P&G has marketed soft-plastic refill pouches of detergents, fabric softeners and other cleaning products in Europe. This fall it introduced similar packaging in Canada under the Enviro-Pak name.

In Canada, P&G is selling Liquid Tide detergent, Ivory dishwashing liquid, Downy fabric softener and Mr. Clean household cleaner in Enviro-Paks, and it's believed one of those products will be used in the U.S. refill pack.

A TV and print campaign will emphasize how the less bulky refill package produces less waste.

"When we introduce the refill pack, we will talk about the environmental benefits," said Carol Boyd, spokeswoman.

P&G paved the way for refill packages and other environmental projects with an October letter from President John Pepper to the nation's top retailers.

In the letter, Mr. Pepper described P&G's commitment to finding solutions to the problem of solid waste. P&G is also said to be developing recycling projects with major retailers, including Wal-Mart Stores.

"In concept-testing, American consumers said they preferred different packaging than what we offer overseas. The U.S. refill pack will be more convenient . . . to use."

Wal-Mart earlier made known its commitment to environmentally responsible products when it informed vendors and suppliers it would highlight all products that help prevent future environmental problems (AA, Aug. 21).

Last week, the chain began airing a 60-

President Bush holds a meeting with ad industry leaders on the anti-drug effort.

'Extraordinary' Bush praises anti-drug effort

By Steven W. Colford

WASHINGTON—President Bush last week lauded agencies and media for supporting his anti-drug effort, and turned up the heat for more time and space.

At a special White House briefing, President Bush stood before some 150 network, agency and corporate leaders and said: "What you are setting out to do, commit $1 million a day, every day, for three years, is truly extraordinary and an effort I personally want to see succeed because it is so important to our struggle against drugs."

He said the industry's Media-Advertising Partnership for a Drug-Free America "is producing hard-hitting, carefully targeted messages, effectively tackling the drug issue from the demand side.

"No one understands demand psychology like you. By applying your marketing experience and advertising talent to unsell drug use and users, your ads are managing to induce a nationwide ideological allergy to illegal drugs."

In an 8-minute address, the president said that "never before in the history of man have such energy and talent and resources been devoted to getting people not to buy something."

Since the partnership's first anti-drug commercial in March 1987, the group—an industry volunteer organization—has placed more than $310 million of such messages in the print and electronic media. The president in a televised speech in September asked for $365 million annually in time and space.

James Burke, chairman of the partnership and former chairman-ceo at Johnson & Johnson, and William Bennett, director of the Office of National Drug Control Policy, shared the stage with President Bush. They urged the audience to donate more "free" time and space.

"So far, the cooperation of the media has been impressive," said Mr. Burke. "So,

Sears heavies TV; papers take cuts

By Kate Fitzgerald and Janet Meyers

NEW YORK—Sears, Roebuck & Co. said it will substantially increase its TV and radio advertising in 1990 and cut back on newspaper ads to make its "everyday low price" strategy succeed.

Sears has scheduled a meeting with newspaper industry representatives in Chicago for Nov. 21, where it will unveil its 1990 newspaper ad budget, a spokesman said.

Newspaper industry sources said Sears indicated it may cut back on print advertising in smaller markets next year.

At its annual meeting with analysts last week, Chairman, President-CEO Edward Brennan conceded Sears' everyday low pricing plan requires several adjustments, including communicating its message more effectively.

Sears launched the everyday low price strategy last March amid the biggest ad blitz in its history, trumpeting its switch to lower overall prices instead of weekly sales on selected merchandise.

But despite spending an estimated $90 million to advertise the program, results have been disappointing. The Merchandise Group's income fell 3% in the third quarter to $278.3 million compared with the same period in 1988. Sears' October sales were just 0.7% higher than the year-ago period (see related story on Page 3).

Merchandise Group Chairman Michael Bozic said the company's advertising media mix is partly to blame for the disappointing results.

"When we made the announcement that we were switching to everyday low pricing [on Oct. 31, 1988], we were too late to buy

Tobacco efforts under fire

HOUSTON—Doctors Ought to Care, an anti-smoking group, wants the federal government to look into what it says are cases of marketers subverting the 1971 broadcast ban on tobacco advertising. The founder, Dr. Alan Blum, said the group is petitioning the U.S. Department of Justice to look at Philip Morris Cos.' "Bill of Rights" campaign now running on network TV (see Hot Stuff on Page 3). He said the organization has also filed a complaint with the Justice Department over a Home Box Office program, "Inside the NFL," which he called "a veiled ad" for U.S. Tobacco's Skoal Bandit chewing tobacco.

Nissan starts '90 ads

CARSON, Calif.—Nissan on Nov. 13 starts its formal 1990 model-year advertising with estimated spending of $200 million-plus. Spots for the 1990 Stanza sedan broke in October (AA, Oct. 9). The campaign, themed "Fantasy," attempts to build on the previous "Human Engineering" concept. At least six spots depict fantasies, such as Nissan vehicles outrunning motorcycles, race cars and even a fighter jet. Model Christie Brinkley and actor Ken Wahl appear in the spots. The centerpiece spot, featuring Nissan's top-of-the-line 300ZX Turbo, will break nationally on the Super Bowl telecast next year. The campaign retains the "Built for the human race" tagline. Campbell gets new bottom-line accent

By Judann Dagnoli

Campbell Soup Co. is about to enter a period of layoffs, plant closures and divestitures. But company executives insist its traditionally heavy emphasis on advertising and marketing will remain intact.

The abrupt early retirement of President-CEO R. Gordon McGovern, 63, last week was the first sign of a stricter emphasis on the bottom line at the soup giant.

"The take on Campbell was always that it was fat and happy. But now, I don't think it will be as pleasant a place to work," said a securities analyst attending a Nov. 2 meeting with company executives.

Executives who talked tough about the bottom line at the meeting were Campbell USA President Herb Baum, 53, and corporate Senior VP-Chief Financial Officer Edwin Harper, 47. The two are succeeding Mr. McGovern on an interim basis and are the two in-house candidates competing for the permanent post.

Campbell is also looking outside for leadership; a decision is expected by January.

To trim costs and fatten profits, "every business will come under the microscope," Mr. Baum said. "We will look at people, operating efficiencies and market trends to see [that these businesses] are alive and well."

He added that "if a business does not meet our objectives and there's no future, we will not be shy about taking action."

Sources said Messrs. Baum and Harper will compete fiercely for the top job, doing whatever is

Midler 'sound-alike' win means creative changes

By Marcy Magiera

LOS ANGELES—One day after Bette Midler won her "sound-alike" lawsuit against Young & Rubicam, an agency here learned it may face similar charges.

Asher/Gould was notified Oct. 31 that singer Patti Page planned to file suit over a TV commercial the agency created for American Savings & Loan. The spot, which ran earlier this year, included a rendition of "Old Cape Cod," a number popularized by Ms. Page in the 1950s.

The suit will be filed this week, said Jack Rael, Ms. Page's manager and business-partner. Ms. Page's suit is being handled by Arrow, Edelstein & Laird, the same law firm that represented Ms. Midler.

Singers aren't the only ones encouraged by Ms. Midler's success. Vanna White of the TV quiz show "Wheel of Fortune" has sued Samsung Electronics America and its agency, Deutsch, New York, for a TV spot promoting the company's VCRs.

The spot in question features a robot on a game show set, which Ms. White maintains attacks her credibility as a TV presenter. The suit, filed in U.S. District Court here, is scheduled for trial early next month.

Other lawyers predict similar suits will follow and that agencies will rethink any ideas they have about creating ads that feature celebrity voices or likenesses.

A week earlier, a judge dismissed Ford as a defendant.

Y&R issued a terse statement, saying it was caught in the middle of a changing standard and calling the decision "unfortunate but bearable."

"We were following the law as it existed in 1985," the statement said in part. "The interpretation of the law did not change until yesterday. Until then you had to buy rights of songs and arrange-

McElligott nears decision

By Bob Geiger

MINNEAPOLIS—Tom McElligott is coming back to advertising, but not to the city he helped put on the ad map.

The former creative director of Fallon McElligott last week said he'll possibly decide this week between two job offers. "It will be resolved in the not-so-distant future," he said.

Mr. McElligott, 46, wouldn't disclose the two agencies he's considering, but one source said they're Chiat/Day/Mojo, Venice, Calif., and Hal Riney & Partners, San Francisco. Sources said they believe Riney has the edge.

Foote, Cone & Belding, Chicago, and Ogilvy & Mather, New York, also have been mentioned as landing spots for Mr. McElligott.

T. McElligott

Mr. McElligott said there will be "opportunities for questions in one of two cities," but neither Minneapolis nor St. Paul is on the list.

Late last year, he announced that he'd sever ties with Fallon, the agency he co-founded in 1981.

Since then, Mr. McElligott has heard from many agencies, ranging from megashops to "a two-man shopping center agency in Montana," he said.

Mr. McElligott is largely credited with Minneapolis' rise as an ad market, and though local ad executives expressed regret that he's leaving, they didn't expect him to stay.

"I think it's an emotional loss," said Gary LaMaster, principal of Lacey LaMaster Larson Farmer. "It's the guy who everybody credits, rightly or wrongly, with giving us the reputation we have. It's like Hal Riney leaving San Francisco."

John Olson, principal of Kruskopf Olson, said Mr. McElligott's looming departure is "unfortunate. We want to export work, not talent."

Tom Weyl, president-chief creative officer at Martin/Williams, said, "I thought, 'Someone's going to offer him so much money in New York or Los Angeles, it's just a matter of which agency does less embarrassing work.' " □

De Beers mines hot market for diamonds

By David Kilburn

TOKYO—Japan has become a best friend to diamond marketer De Beers Consolidated Mines.

The Japanese spend $10.4 billion annually on diamond jewelry, more than any other country. Accounting for 30% of worldwide retail sales, they are just ahead of the U.S. at 29%. Japan, however, ranks second to the U.S. in total carat purchases.

Diamond marketing in Japan began in 1967 when De Beers started advertising engagement rings with the help of J. Walter Thompson Co. At that time only 6% of Japanese brides had diamond engagement rings; today, 77% do. An average of $2,600 is spent on each engagement ring.

De Beers last month launched a $7 million TV, magazine and newspaper effort to expand the market further. Another $2.1 million is going into promotion.

The campaign aims to introduce a new social custom—a husband presenting his wife with a diamond gift, called the "Sweet 10 Diamond," on the couple's 10th wedding anniversary.

Other gift occasions were studied, too, but the 10th wedding anniversary emerged not only as the most acceptable but also as the one with the greatest marketing potential.

"Diamond rings are accepted as an important part of an engagement," said Mariko Watanabe, brand manager for De Beers at JWT Japan. However, marketing diamond gifts to women directly presents some barriers. "Many Japanese women would love to own a piece of diamond jewelry, but they refrain from buying it themselves," he said.

The strategy to overcome this reluctance is to invest the new diamond gift with emotional values, as was done with engagement rings and more recently with what's called a "return gift," the present of a diamond that a woman is encouraged to buy for her fiance in return for the engagement ring. The Japanese spend an estimated $800 for a "return gift," usually a pinkie ring.

Advertising for the "Sweet 10" campaign is built around family snapshots from a real couple who celebrated their 10th anniversary this year. In the TV spot, viewers see them as if they were in pages being turned in a photo album.

Alternating with pictures from the album, a man's hand places 10 sparkling diamonds one by one on a black surface.

In Japan, about 700,000 couples get married each year. More than 93% are still married after—10 years, compared with about 60% in the U.S. Only 48% of Japanese women own diamond jewelry, compared with 77% in the U.S.

"The Sweet 10's market potential is clearly enormous," said Gus Iizuka, VP-director of client service for De Beers at JWT Japan. □

Japan's Dentsu is dominant in Asia/Pacific

By Julie Skur Hill

Japanese powerhouse Dentsu reports in as the world's top agency network in the Asia/Pacific region in Advertising Age's first ranking of the area's agencies.

The strong Asian-based agencies, garnering the bulk of their total worldwide gross income from the 13-country area, dominate the region.

The 13 countries in the region are New Zealand, Australia, Thailand, Japan, the Philippines, Singapore, India, South Korea, Indonesia, Malaysia, Pakistan, Taiwan and Sri Lanka.

Rankings are based on gross income in dollar amounts that a network derives from the region. Only two of the top 10 worldwide networks aren't based in Japan.

As a result, Ad Age created a second ranking to show how the non-Asian networks stack up in the region. McCann-Erickson Worldwide, New York, ranking No. 6 in the tough worldwide competition, came out on top of the non-Asian agency list.

Tokyo-based Dentsu, the world's largest agency, is starting to build its presence outside its homeland. However, the agency's strength in Japan and the power of the yen against the dollar enabled Dentsu to leave its competition in the dust. Dentsu pulled in $1.2 billion in gross income from the region in 1988.

Predictably, Hakuhodo, Japan's No. 2 agency, holds the same rank in the Asia/Pacific. Hakuhodo's gross income for the region grew 36% in 1988 to $522.2 million.

The Asia/Pacific agency rankings for Nos. 3, 4 and 5 read much like those rankings for Japan itself.

Here, however, figures include equity-adjusted totals from subsidiaries and affiliates. Source: Advertising Age within Japan, Dai-Ichi Kikaku, is No. 3 and Daiko Advertising, Osaka, is No. 4. On the Asia/Pacific chart, those two agencies change places. Tokyu Agency, Tokyo, ranks No. 5 on both.

McCann, one of the few Western agencies with a proven track record in Japan, is boosted by McCann-Erickson Hakuhodo in Tokyo, one of the few successful Japanese-U.S. agency joint ventures.

McCann is followed in the Asia/Pacific rankings by Japan-based Asatsu, I&S Corp. and Yomiko Advertising, coming in at Nos. 7, 8 and 9, respectively.

Backer Spielvogel Bates Worldwide, New York, placing No. 10 in the worldwide rankings, is McCann's closest Western rival.

Still, Backer's gross income from the region of $79.4 million is 37% lower than McCann's.

While McCann derives 19.3% of its worldwide gross income from the Asia/Pacific, Backer pulls in only 11.1%.

Among non-Asian agencies, the former Mojo MDA, Sydney, now part of Chiat/Day/Mojo and HDM Mattingly, ranks No. 3. The Australian agency group, including its Mattingly division, drew 83.7% of its worldwide gross income from the Asia/Pacific region.

J. Walter Thompson Co., New York, made 10.2% of its worldwide gross income in the Asia/Pacific, pulling in $56.8 million from the region. This well-established international network placed fourth among the non-Asians.

HDM—the joint venture of Young & Rubicam, New York; Havas, Paris; and Dentsu—nudged New York-based Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising Worldwide out of fifth place on the non-Asian rankings.

HDM pulled in 16.8% of its worldwide gross income from the region, while Saatchi claimed 6.1% of its worldwide gross income from the Asia/Pacific.

No. 9 Ogilvy & Mather Worldwide, New York, proved that an agency doesn't have to be strong in Japan to rank among top 10 non-Asian agencies.

O&M is still looking for opportunities to re-enter Japan after pulling out of Asia's largest market last year. BBDO Worldwide, ranked No. 10 among the non-Asians, holds equity in Japan's Asatsu, Tokyo, as well as assorted shops around the region. □

Dailies' circulation rebounding

Decline in 'WSJ' numbers slows

By Ira Teinowitz

The latest Audit Bureau of Circulations report offers generally good news for the newspaper industry, with circulation up in virtually every major market.

The report for the six months ended Sept. 30 is in sharp contrast to just six months ago when a spate of circulation decreases prompted industry concerns and a national conference to find ways to lure new readers (AA, May 1).

One exception to the upward trend was The Wall Street Journal, whose circulation slide continued, though at a lesser rate.

Other papers reporting declines included the Chicago Sun-Times, New York Daily News and the now-shuttered Los Angeles Herald Examiner.

Among the gainers, The Dallas Morning News reported adjusted daily circulation up 4.9% to 382,335 (see chart); The Denver Post grew 4% to 240,162 in daily circulation; and the Rocky Mountain News reported Sunday circulation rose 3.9% to 404,480.

USA Today also grew, with average circulation up 4.3% to 1,396,738 when adjusted for the paper's larger Friday edition.

Conversely, WSJ has had circulation declines since the October 1987 stock market plunge. In the past year, the paper has added a third section, a marketing column and changed ad agencies in an attempt to boost circulation.

Roger May, Dow Jones & Co. director of corporate relations, said the 1.8% decline to 1,835,713 for the latest period represented progress since the rate of decline had slowed.

"We look on this as a brightening figure," he said. "The deficit narrowed since our March 1989 circulation figures, and the indication is that we are pulling off the crash. We are also getting good reception to three sections and have a good renewal rate. We are gaining."

Officials at the Chicago Sun-Times didn't return phone calls about the latest figures, showing the paper down 7.5% in daily circulation to 535,864 and down 6.2% in Sunday circulation to 563,148. The figures give the Sun-Times its lowest daily circulation in 20 years and its lowest Sunday circulation in 34 years.

■ The Audit Bureau of Circulations' latest figures update those contained in this issue's "Special Report" on newspapers.

Meanwhile, the rival Chicago Tribune gained 2.3% in Sunday circulation to 1,122,977 and 0.6% in daily circulation to 720,155.

In New York, the Daily News continued its slide with circulation down 6.8% to 1,194,237 daily and down 9.3% to 1,422,861 on Sundays.

The numbers are "no surprise. They are consistent with our plans to re-establish a more efficient circulation base," said Tom Iaquinta, VP-circulation.

Mr. Iaquinta said the paper has been concentrating its efforts on New York and its close-in suburbs that most benefit advertisers with the result that circulation outside has fallen. He said that within the paper's core market, circulation is within 2% of what it was in 1987.

The New York Post also reported a circulation decline, down 7.8% to 507,568 daily. (The soon-to-be dead Sunday Post reported circulation of 229,142.)

President Valerie Salembier attributed the drop to the Post's hike in circulation price to 40¢ from 35¢ a year ago.

"We dropped a lot of readers, but the demographic improvement has been phenomenal," she said.

Both The New York Times and Newsday reported increases, though Newsday's Sunday sales were off slightly.

In Los Angeles, the announcement of the Herald Examiner's closing came only hours after release of its circulation figures. The paper reported daily circulation of 232,437, down 1.2%, and 173,814 on Sunday, down 6.4%.

Among other papers reporting gains: the St. Louis Post-Dispatch was up 1.2% to 376,888 in daily circulation and 2.1% to 557,941 on Sundays; The Boston Globe, up 1.4% to 516,031 daily and unchanged at 787,029 on Sundays; and The Miami Herald, up 2.9% to 412,933 daily and 3.3% to 515,856 on Sundays. The Miami News ceased publication on Jan. 1.

San Francisco papers didn't report numbers—likely due to the recent earthquake—and the Houston Chronicle failed to file its figures. □

Budweiser's sales slipping

By Ira Teinowitz

The "king of beers" is starting to look less regal.

After years of growth, Anheuser-Busch's No. 1-selling Budweiser is showing signs of softening sales.

For a long time, Bud has been virtually alone in maintaining growth in the face of consumers' switch to light beers. But that may be changing.

Concerns about Budweiser could have led in part to the recent warning from A-B Chairman August A. Busch III that the company may increase discounting (AA, Oct. 30).

Both Information Resources Inc.'s InfoScan and Nielsen Marketing Research's ScanTrack show that Budweiser's sales through early September are down from a year ago.

InfoScan, which tracks supermarket and some drugstore beer sales (but not important bar, stadium or liquor store sales), showed Budweiser trending downward from about 15.5% of the grocery/drugstore market at the start of the year to slightly less than 15% in mid-September.

Grocery/drugstore sales account for roughly 70% of total beer sales, said Jerry Steinman, publisher of Beer Marketer's Insights. The grocery segment alone accounts for $6 billion in sales.

ScanTrack, which also relies mostly on grocery-store data, shows Budweiser's share dropping 0.3 points to 16.5% for the same period.

In some individual markets, Budweiser's fall is greater.

ScanTrack reported the beer is down 2.1 share points in Atlanta to 19.6%; 2.8 points in New York to 26.4%; and 2.3 points in San Francisco to 29.6%.

A-B executives declined several requests for comment on the declines.

The long switchover to light beers undoubtedly is getting to the flagship brand.

Light beers have more than doubled their volume from 1980 to 1988, while the industry saw only a 5.2% volume increase, said

Ayer buys Zwiren

CHICAGO—N W Ayer reached an agreement in principle to buy Zwiren, Collins, Karo, Trusk here and will merge it with Ayer's troubled Chicago office, sources said. Zwiren, which claims billings of $29 million, handles several consumer product brands of Miles Inc., its largest client. Zwiren President Jan Zwiren will keep that post at the merged agency. Ayer's office here was left with only Leaf Inc. and DAP following the loss of Deere & Co., Illinois Bell, regional Burger King Corp. business and other accounts recently (AA, Aug. 28).

Y&R to seek dismissal

NEW YORK—Young & Rubicam is expected to move to dismiss the federal bribery and conspiracy charges stemming from its handling of the Jamaica Tourist Board account, sources said. Lawyers for Steve McKenna, a former Y&R senior VP now on leave as senior VP-chief financial officer of subsidiary Wunderman Worldwide, are expected to move to have his perjury case separated from the agency's trial. Last week, Y&R delivered a motion to the clerk at U.S. District Court in Hartford, Conn., to take depositions of members of the Jamaica Tourist Board, which selected Y&R to handle the account in 1981. A Y&R spokesman said it has affidavits from board members saying "no one attempted to influence their decision to select Young & Rubicam." Y&R has denied charges it paid Jamaican businessman Arnold Foote Jr. to bribe former Tourism Minister Anthony Abrahams to get the $8 million account.

New tobacco bill offered

WASHINGTON—Sen. Edward Kennedy (D., Mass.) on Nov. 15 will introduce a bill prohibiting cultural and sports sponsorships by tobacco marketers as well as the appearance of models in tobacco ads, sources said. The bill represents the first attempt by the Senate to restrict tobacco ads. Sen. Kennedy, a longtime cigar smoker, is chairman of the Senate Labor & Human Resources Committee that Congress eyes PM's 'Rights'

By Steven W. Colford

WASHINGTON—A congressional committee this week will question whether Philip Morris Cos.' new $60 million "Bill of Rights" ad campaign is an attempt to skirt the federal ban against broadcast tobacco advertising.

Barely two weeks out of the box, the giant consumer products company's TV and print campaign is winning critics almost as quickly as it has lured phone calls from readers interested in obtaining a copy of the Bill of Rights.

Although the campaign, by Ogilvy & Mather, New York, makes no mention of cigarettes, tobacco or smoking, it's irritated health groups and members of Congress, including Rep. Thomas Luken (D., Ohio), whose Subcommittee on Transportation & Hazardous Materials has set a hearing for Nov. 15.

Although a committee aide declined to confirm the campaign would be the focus of the hearing, the aide acknowledged the session would target "current tobacco advertising that may conflict with" the TV ad ban.

■ Is Philip Morris' ad for Virginia Slims Superslims a ruse?—Page 94.

That also leaves open the possibility the Luken inquiry may examine R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co. and its recent use of direct-mail home video ads for low-tar Now cigarettes (AA, Oct. 23).

Rep. Luken "is certainly aware of" the new Philip Morris campaign, the aide said, "and Rep. Luken usually doesn't like what the tobacco companies are doing."

A Philip Morris spokesman said the company was aware of the hearings but hadn't yet, to his knowledge, been invited to attend. The committee sent notices to potential witnesses late on Nov. 8, and the U.S. Postal Service was closed Nov. 10 for Veterans Day, adding more uncertainty to who may appear before the hastily convened hearing.

"We're proud of the campaign, and it speaks for itself," said Guy Smith, VP-corporate affairs at Philip Morris. "It's about the Bill of Rights, and that's all it's about," he said, stressing that it isn't cigarette advertising.

Even as Rep. Luken prepared for his hearing, a House committee and a Senate

Anti-drug boost

Yellow Pages pledge $41M in PSAs

By Steven W. Colford

WASHINGTON—The nation's Yellow Pages publishers, in one of the largest single commitments to public service advertising, have pledged more than $41 million in 1990 ad space to anti-drug messages.

In a major boost to the campaign of the Media-Advertising Partnership for a Drug-Free America, the Yellow Pages Publishers Association leapfrogged over other media with a commitment for donated space likely to exceed $50 million next year once all the pledges are in.

Only the combined total of donated media time from local TV is believed to exceed the association's contribution, said Mike Townsend, communications director for the partnership.

The contribution was disclosed to President Bush Nov. 2 when YPPA President Ray Avedian and a bevy of other agency and media heavyweights visited the White House for a briefing (AA, Nov. 6).

The contribution was included in the figures when partnership Chairman James Burke estimated the current level of contributed media to be about $300 million, or about 20% short of the partnership's goal of $365 million a year.

Barely a year old, the Yellow Pages group recognized the opportunity to siphon away a fraction of its members' annual revenues—$7.8 billion in 1988—for a high-profile cause, said Larry Small, YPPA communications director.

The association encompasses more than 300 companies, including 150 Yellow Pages publishers, and its members account for about 96% of all Yellow Pages revenues.

Among the group's members committing sizable amounts of space next year are Bell Atlantic Corp., Nynex Corp., Illinois Bell, US West and Southwestern Bell Corp.

Mr. Avedian said the association learned of the partnership and its quest for donated media in April when Lynn Mapes, the partnership's retiring media director, addressed a YPPA board meeting. Mr. Mapes then spoke at the association's annual meeting Oct. 17.

"He was overwhelmingly received," Mr. Avedian said. "There wasn't a dry eye in the house. I'd call Lynn Mapes the Billy Graham of advertising, the way he talked."

Martin/Williams, the Minneapolis agency handling the association account, has already altered some partnership-created ads for distribution to member publishers.

Besides back covers, the anti-drug messages will be sprinkled liberally throughout the directories. □

Rivals gang up on IBM

By Jennifer Lawrence

The so-called Gang of Nine is unleashing its first IBM attack ad with a 24-page insert in The Wo'l Street Journal.

When the group of personal computer marketers runs the ad Nov. 14, it's likely Big Blue will see red.

In an advertorial format, the group, which includes Compaq, NEC and Tandy, makes the case for open computer design standards rather than proprietary standards set by a single company.

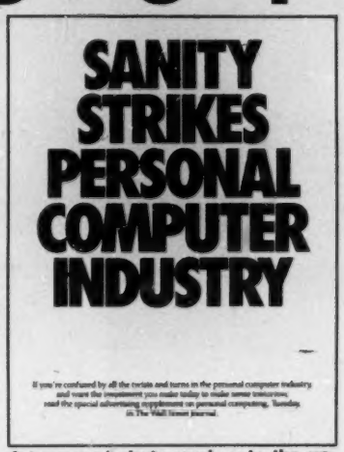
That single company is IBM Corp., though the computer giant isn't mentioned by name.

The ad supplement, featuring both editorial-type copy and page ads, sets the stage for a new generation of high-performance PCs based on Extended Industry Standard Architecture, or EISA.

IBM abandoned the industry standard 2½ years ago when it switched to Micro Channel Architecture, a proprietary pathway design for high-performance PCs.

About half a dozen companies will unveil their EISA products at the Comdex/Fall '89 trade show that starts today.

The long-awaited products will give consumers an alternative to IBM's PS/2 machines, prompting what analysts expect will develop into a heated product battle and increased advertising.



A teaser ad alerts readers to the upcoming ad supplement.

One marketing insider expects PC category spending—now at around $400 million—to jump to $500 million in 1990.

The gang, also called the EISA consortium, includes AST Research, Compaq Computer Corp., Epson America, Hewlett-Packard Co., NEC Technologies, Olivetti USA, Tandy Corp., Wyse Technology and Zenith Data Systems Corp.

The group is said to be spending more than $1 million this week alone to position EISA products against IBM's PS/2 Micro Channel Architecture machines.

The ad supplement is meant to communicate the "breadth of support" in the marketplace for EISA, said Kirk Walden, senior VP-client service director at Ogilvy & Mather, Houston, the agency that coordinated the gang's advertising.

O&M worked with client Compaq, the eight other companies and their agencies to produce the insert and a teaser ad running today in the WSJ and Barron's headlined

Wall open to 'paradise'

By Dagmar Mussey and Kevin Cote

Last weekend, the Frankfurt-based chairman of Ogilvy & Mather Germany, Hans-Juergen Lange, went to visit relatives in East Germany, the first time he could freely do so in many years.

Mr. Lange, born in Leipzig, had fled with his family shortly after the end of World War II. He, like other former East Germans, has been prevented from visiting relatives' homes freely.

"This is a development nobody had expected," he said, commenting on the surprise opening Nov. 9 of the 28-year-old Berlin Wall.

But along with being reunited with family, East Germans pouring into West Germany are grabbing up Western goods and enjoying generous donations from global marketers.

Procter & Gamble Co. has been sending trucks full of Pampers disposable diapers, Ariel detergents, Blend-a-med toothpaste, Shamtu shampoo, Vicks cough drops and Punica orange juice to the various camps along the West German border.

Colgate-Palmolive Co. has also donated goods.

West Berlin, where more than 10,000 East Berliners visited for the first time Friday, is experiencing the largest shopping spree in the city's history.

"These people are wandering around in this paradise in wonderment with a look of shock and disbelief in their eyes," said Wilhelm Stratmann, chief executive of KaDeWe, West Berlin's upscale department store.

East Germans clogged KaDeWe's gourmet food and record departments, making small purchases with their East German marks.

Since the first wave of immigrants arrived in October, economists have predicted a consumer spending boom as East Germans acquire Western goods.

The economic growth could benefit the media and agencies. "We have reason to believe a free press is emerging fairly fast," said West German-born Willi Schalk, BBDO Worldwide president-chief operating officer. "I have reason to believe there are some [mem-

Ratios indicate hikes in ad levels

LINCOLNSHIRE, Ill.—Healthcare and electronics are among the categories expected to significantly boost ad spending this year, according to the latest study by Schonfeld & Associates.

The 13th edition of Schonfeld's study, "Advertising Ratios & Budgets," uses data from more than 5,700 public companies in more than 400 industry sectors to compile ad spending estimates and advertising-to-sales ratios. The accompanying chart shows estimated 1989 ratios for 200 of the largest ad-spending industries.

Both the hospitals and hospital and medical service plans categories will spend about 25% more this year, the study projects. The radiotelephone communications category can expect better than 28% growth, and cable and pay TV services will be up more than 20%, it says.

The data are compiled from a variety of sources, including the 10-K financial reports of publicly held companies.

Estimates and forecasts are developed through historical data.

Based on these data, the accompanying table shows industries listed by four-digit Standard Industrial Classification code, advertising expenditures as a percentage of sales and as a percentage of gross margin (sales minus cost of goods sold) and the ad expenditure growth (or decline) percentage for 1989 compared to 1988.

Eugene P. Schonfeld, author of the study, advises caution in use and intepretation of the data because:

- Expenditures included as advertising in 10-K and other financial reports may vary from company to company.
- Financial events such as mergers, acquisitions and divestitures may distort spending patterns.
- Private ownership of very large companies in specific industries may mean that some significant ad expenditures are omitted.
- Multi-industry companies are reported only in their primary industry, based on sales of their dominant line of business.

Also included in the study are forecasts for 1990 ad spending. It contains sales growth rates as well as advertising growth rates by company.

The large diversified food companies are forecast to spend $8.4 billion in advertising in 1990, up 13%. Restaurant chains will show 7.6% ad budget growth on spending of $1.5 billion, the report predicts. The amusement and motion picture industries are also expected to share in the fun with ad growth rates above 13%. Others looking at double-digit growth include airlines, health services, mail order and financial services.

Copies of the complete 222-page study are available for $295 ($285 prepaid) from Schonfeld & Associates, 1 Sherwood Drive, 60069. Phone: (312) 948-8080. Data are also available on diskettes. □

Agency employment rankings

Total staffing at the top 10 U.S. agency employers rose 1% in the most recent six-month period, despite cutbacks at Ogilvy & Mather and elsewhere, due mainly to new business gained from smaller agencies.

Agencies stay lean as staffing rises only 1%

By Gary Levin and Jon Lafayette

If it isn't already apparent: The days are gone when a big account win meant a wave of hiring at the largest of agencies.

Instead, the employment picture at major U.S. agencies is remaining flat, Advertising Age's semiannual employment survey showed.

Combined U.S. staffing at the 10 largest employers as of this month rose to 21,518, up a meager 1% from last April and a 3.1% increase from November 1988. (The gains also reflect acquisitions by the largest agencies.)

Ogilvy & Mather's total staff dropped 5.4% in the most recent six-month period, by far the most significant decline, while Leo Burnett USA's staff grew 5%, the largest gain.

"[Client] man-hours are not going down. [But] there are fewer people sitting around with nothing to do."

Interpublic Group of Cos.' Lintas:USA and McCann-Erickson Worldwide both reported modest staff declines, while the increases at the other six largest employers ranged from 1% to nearly 3%.

Agencies ranked just below the top 10 include BBDO Worldwide, DDB Needham Worldwide, N W Ayer, Bozell and Backer Spielvogel Bates.

"As everybody else, we're trying to be more efficient," said Peter Schweitzer, vice chairman-agency operations for J. Walter Thompson Co. JWT USA gained 2.9%, but most of that came from the 57 employees inherited with its July acquisition of Anderson Fischel, a Dallas-based recruitment agency.

"We're lucky enough not to have to add massively in the wake of new business and not to have to be cutting back if there are losses," Mr. Schweitzer said. "Everybody's working a little harder. But it will always be an issue when the bulk of your costs are in payroll; you've always got to manage it."

Layoffs themselves are now regarded as a fact of life at agencies, which earlier recoiled at the prospect of putting people on the street. Layoffs, "once a painful thing agencies did with distaste, have become almost mechanized," said one agency chief. "We [simply] look at the numbers and make the adjustments."

"What we're doing is continually restructuring and reorganizing to be efficient," said Edward Wax, president-ceo, Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising. "You've got senior people who are 70% to 80% busy. You're not going to fire them. . . . [Instead] you give them more business to load them up to full efficiency.

"Clients won't suffer; they're getting better people who are more productive. Their man-hours are not going down. [But] there are fewer people sitting around with nothing to do."

Saatchi has filled about half of the 106 jobs that have become vacant since the summer of 1988. Still, Saatchi's staffing levels rose 1.6% in the most recent six-month period. But Mr. Wax noted the agency's new business, including its share of the Burger King Corp. account, was much larger than 1.6% of revenues.

Employment will be particularly tight at companies that have been involved in expensive acquisitions, some executives said.

"I expect that most people are projecting conservative growth," said John Dooner Jr., exec VP and North American president at McCann. "In order to get double-digit profit growth, they'll be pruning like crazy, especially those agencies with a lot of debt."

McCann itself lost 1.4% of its staff since March, after losing R.J. Reynolds Tobacco's Camel and Winston business last summer.

But staff cuts aren't necessarily bad. "It's not the number of heads, but the heads themselves," said PaineWebber analyst Alan Gottesman, who added he's encouraged agencies are able to work more efficiently with leaner staffs. □

The healthy alternative

Where the grocery industry is heading in the next decade

By Julie Liesse Erickson

1990s

When Eve pulled the apple off the fabled Garden of Eden tree, it had not been treated with Alar or any other environmentally suspicious pesticide; apples and cancer had no connection, nor was there an easier or faster way to eat that apple.

"Since the time of Adam and Eve, food consumption has gone through three general areas," says Ted Keller, VP-sales and marketing for health foods at Pet Inc.

"First humans ate for survival. Then the element of taste and self-indulgence became important. Now we are entering an era when people eat to live longer and have healthier lives.

"The whole notion of food as a life-prolonging system is a revolutionary idea," says Mr. Keller.

Consumers' reaction to products touting oat bran demonstrates they will change their habits to extend and improve their lives, he says.

The linkage of diet and health is the most significant of an entirely new set of rules facing the $354 billion grocery industry as it heads into a new decade:

- Although deregulation ruled the 1980s, food labels and advertising likely will be subjected to sweeping new regulations in the next few years.
- Product tampering and microwave gadgetry prompted marketers to add layers of extra protection to their packages. But, as overpackaging becomes a target of the environmentally conscious shopper, the layers are likely to be peeled off.
- In the '80s, retailers challenged the power of manufacturers by leveraging shelf space against ever-increasing promotional dollars, a trend that manufacturers continue to try to address. But the greatest challenge may be a proliferation of private-label products competing with national brands.
- While the products that set the style of the '80s fluctuated wildly between consumers' desire to eat light—for example, Lean Cuisine, Diet Coke, NutraSweet—and their enthusiastic self-indulgence—perhaps represented best by the DoveBar—brands that will succeed in the 1990s must address Americans' hope for a longer life through a healthy diet via fat substitutes, not sugar substitutes.

The greatest challenge for marketers is keeping up with the changes.

"We're like the drum major in front of the parade; if the crowd turns, we'd better be out front," says Philip Fletcher, president and chief operating officer of ConAgra. "And we have to see what's in front as well as what's behind."

New role for food

Up front for food marketers approaching the next decade is the perceived new efficacy of food that some executives say is one of the most revolutionary ideas—and greatest opportunities—in the industry's history.

"There has been no significant technological change in food processing in years," says ConAgra's Mr. Fletcher. "We've done a lot in terms of packaging innovations to deal with the microwave, but other than

The looming battle for center of the plate

Shelf-stable, refrigerated fare attacks frozens

By Judann Dagnoli and Julie Liesse Erickson

PRODUCT

The center of the plate, central to consumers' grocery shopping habits, is likely to become the center of the marketing battle of the '90s. The fight will focus on new shelf-stable and refrigerated meals pushing to replace frozens.

"By the year 2000, it is conceivable that prepared frozen microwaveable foods will be facing very stiff competition from the dry grocery shelves," says Catherine Roberts, a consultant with researcher Find/SVP. "Therefore, it is incumbent upon marketers to develop their strategies now."

Frozen food leaders such as Kraft General Foods Group and Campbell Soup Co. are testing shelf-stable or refrigerated adjuncts to their frozen lines.

At $5.8 billion in 1988 supermarket sales, frozen foods remain the dominant force in the prepared-foods category.

The biggest threat to frozens, Ms. Roberts says, are shelf-stable meals, which have longer shelf lives than refrigerated foods, are more portable than frozens and less costly for retailers to carry.

Shelf-stable foods, she says, have the potential to take away 10% of frozen-food sales by the end of the next decade.

The future is especially bright for "tub" packed shelf-stable foods, such as Dial Corp.'s Lunch Bucket and Geo. A. Hormel & Co.'s chili and stew products, which consumers view as "the logical extension of the can," says Ms. Roberts. Under optimum conditions, tub products could take away as much as 50% of the market for canned vegetables, sauces, soups and prepared foods by 1994, she says.

Shelf-stable microwaveables generally are not perceived to taste as good as frozen foods, but that's likely to change, says Bill Atchinson, senior group product manager for Dial Corp.'s Lunch Bucket shelf-stable line.

"[In] the 1990s, you'll see shelf-stable products closing the product quality gap with frozen," he says.

"It's still an investment in the future," says Mary Anne Jackson, founder and president of My Own Meals. "Although it won't replace canned or frozen foods, the shelf-stable category has more growth potential than any other category in the marketplace."

Because of their portability, "Shelf-stable will be pulling people from a lot of categories, including home cooking. These meals will appeal to people with different needs," Ms. Jackson says.

For retailers, shelf-stable offers financial benefits over frozen or refrigerated foods. Shelf-stable foods offer good margins for retailers, don't require costly refrigerator cases for storage and generate incremental store sales by stealing some business from fast-food restaurants, Mr. Atchinson says.

Shelf-stable foods, by cutting the energy, transportation, storage and handling costs of frozen foods, reduce distribution costs about 25%, Ms. Roberts says.

But shelf-stable foods still have a long way to go.

Tray-packed meals like Hormel's Top Shelf, Kraft General Foods' Impromptu and My Own Meals "are likely to meet a far greater degree of consumer resistance and skepticism than any other category of microwaveable food," Ms. Roberts says.

Some say taste and quality is holding back shelf-stable foods.

"Shelf-stable meals have made real progress and the quality has improved substantially—but not enough to be a serious threat to frozens," says Robert Gillespie, Best Foods president.

Rick Bross, director of marketing-grocery products at Hormel, agrees—to a point. "We have some darn good products out there now, but packaging and food technology is helping us implement better products each day," he says.

Hormel's 2½-year-old Top Shelf is completing national distribution this year, while the company continues to test its Kid's Kitchen line of shelf-stable children's entrees. Top Shelf soon will package four of its varieties in a bowl instead of a box, to help consumers understand its point of difference.

Ms. Jackson believes price is a major barrier to trial for shelf-stable foods.

"Retailers want to price shelf-stable foods according to frozen food prices," she says.

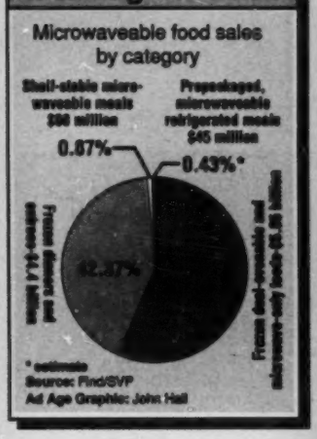
People buy frozen products because it's comfortable, she says. "We have to give them a benefit—lower price—and they will try shelf-stables."

Jules Rose, CEO of Sloan's Supermarkets, believes refrigerated foods—more than shelf-stable and even frozens—have the power to draw more consumers into the store. More and more consumers are shopping the perimeter of the store—where fresh refrigerated cases are usually housed, he says.

To tap the potential of that perimeter, Pet Inc. last year bought deli-salad maker Orval Kent Food Co. as its entry into refrigerated foods. Mary Ellen Roth, VP-sales and marketing for Pet's branded express foods division, will supervise the company's attempt to translate its dry-grocery and frozen brand names—like Old El Paso and Progresso—to the refrigerator case.

However, refrigerated foods also face consumer resistance, particularly in terms of food safety.

Catching the wave



"In the U.K., they had a scare with fresh foods when some of Marks & Spencer's lines turned up with Listeria," says Campbell VP-Market Research Tony Adams.

"Things like that are hard to anticipate and could really hurt the market if it happened here," Mr. Adams says.

Ms. Roth says advances like controlled-atmosphere packaging are critical to category success. New packaging technologies will allow the longer shelf life—30 or 40 days instead of a week—that is key to an efficient distribution system, she says.

And other packaging tools, like time-life indicators that change color when foods are no longer safe, will help build consumer confidence in the category.

"I think if the industry gets to the point where we can deliver fresh food that does not taste processed, which can be a problem with frozen foods, and eliminate mishandling, the taste and freshness of refrigerated foods will win out," says Ms. Roth.

Sales of manufacturers' branded refrigerated microwaveable foods totaled only $5 million to $15 million in 1988, according to Find/SVP.

Retailers have been quick to re-

Chain serves up Buffet

Buffeted by slow-to-respond manufacturers, one convenience chain has cooked up an in-house alternative.

The Fresh Buffet line is Wawa Inc.'s answer to its frustration over food marketers' sluggish response in developing refrigerated products.

The 450-outlet convenience-store chain based in Pennsylvania recently began testing the line of refrigerated entrees in 50 of its stores.

Convenience stores are particularly suited to marketing refrigerated foods because their consumer profile fits uniquely with that of fresh prepared food purchasers, says Ed Burcher, Wawa product planning manager-deli, produce and prepared foods.

Yet, large food manufacturers were not targeting this market.

"A lot of the bigger food companies don't see convenience stores as primary when there are 20,000 supermarkets in the U.S.," says Mr. Burcher.

"Nationally, we're not a big company, but . . . where we distinguish ourselves is in the perishables area," he says.

Another advantage was fresh prepared food buyers tend to consume the products within 24 hours. This fit the profile of convenience-store shoppers, who tend to run in and buy something for quick meals.

"People don't come in and buy 10 [fresh entrees] at a time," he says.

Wawa's Fresh Buffet is made and store-door delivered through an agreement with KeyFresh Foods, a foodservice company that makes the meals using Wawa recipes. There are 20 entrees, but only eight are merchandised at a time, Mr. Burcher says.

Varieties are mainly home-style, such as Lasagne Bolognese, Chicken Mexicana, Shrimp Creole and Pasta Primavera, and priced at $2.89-$3.99.

Both the prices and varieties differ greatly from General Foods' now-disbanded Culinova unit, which failed from projecting too upscale an image, according to industry insiders.

"People like down-to-earth food they can relate to," says Mr. Burcher.

Wawa began creating its own meals rather than wait for a national manufacturer to jump in because they saw an unfilled need. It was not, says Mr. Burcher, because the chain wanted to keep the high-margin profits. "You can't take 50% margins to the bank if you don't have a good product," he says.

There's still shelf space for the off-the-wall

By B.G. Yovovich

ROLE

There's strength in size—when the size is small—says A.E. Hotchner, VP of Newman's Own.

In an era of greater competition for supermarket shelf space, increasingly complicated marketing programs and trade relations, and a market dominated by the mega-giant food combines, the prospects for small, entrepreneurial food marketers may appear less than promising.

But Mr. Hotchner strongly disagrees. He has seen Newman's Own grow from a $40,000 investment in 1983 on an oil and vinegar salad dressing created by movie star Paul Newman to an estimated $44 million in 1989 sales. The line now contains other salad dressings, popcorn, spaghetti sauce and lemonade.

"There are a lot more cracks in the market, more opportunities for small firms today than there were when we started," says Mr. Hotchner.

Newman's Own brain trust: (from l.) President Paul Newman, Exec VP Ursula Hotchner and A.E. Hotchner

According to Mr. Hotchner, the same factors that have spurred interest in ethnic restaurants and exotic cuisines have helped create a receptive consumer environment for new food products.

"The revolution in dining has given the small producer of food products a real chance," he says.

The steadily growing interest in "natural," health-oriented foods has opened new opportunities, as has the emergence of health-food and specialty-food retail outlets.

"There has been a big increase in the number of brokers who distribute to small outlets, and that has been a significant benefit to us," says Mr. Hotchner. "The smaller outlets are willing to place smaller orders, and they don't care as much about small price differentials."

Effectively using this channel of distribution is crucial to a new venture's success.

"It is a mistake [for small producers of food products] to start out by trying to get into the bigger supermarkets," he says. "Those buyers are tough. They drive hard bargains, and they have to be sold on the notion that your product will sell.

"You have got to go into small stores that don't have that kind of competition and where you don't have to buck the big food combines. If you make headway there, you can take the money you make, reinvest it, and begin to promote your product to eventually interest the bigger stores."

Mr. Hotchner also believes entrepreneurs can top large companies in delivering a quality product to consumers.

"My feeling is that the big food companies spend a lot of money on advertising and promotion, but they turn out an inferior product," says Mr. Hotchner.

Small companies need to take advantage of that and make sure that "the product that you put on the shelf is different, has some appeal, and is better than what the big guys put out. If you make it good, people will discover it. And, if you have a product that sells, the retailers will stock it." □

Mary Anne Jackson

PEOPLE TO WATCH

Mary Anne Jackson started out with a typical mother's goal: providing nutritious and hot but convenient meals for her children.

But Ms. Jackson, 36, isn't an ordinary mom. Formerly director-operations planning for the Swift-Eckrich division of Beatrice Co., Ms. Jackson used her food industry expertise to create My Own Meal, a line of shelf-stable meals for children.

Two-and-a-half years later, My Own Meal is distributed in about 1,000 Midwest grocery stores, and in 86 Toys R Us stores in the Midwest, New York, Connecticut and New Jersey. If the Toys R Us test succeeds, it could be expanded to the rest of the chain.

Ms. Jackson's Deerfield, Ill.-based company uses direct mail and spot TV, produced by an ad-hoc group of freelancers, to support the product line. Daughter Katie, 4½, stars in the commercials with mom; son Joey, 2, helps as a taste tester.

Ms. Jackson's current goal is to get My Own Meal into national distribution. After that, she's eyeing line extensions and other products.

"But my objective is to focus on kids," she says. "I believe in doing one thing well."

spond with unbranded refrigerated food sales—often prepared by the retailer. Find/SVP reports sales of these products reached $30 million to $40 million.

Convenience, one of the biggest advantages of refrigerated foods, can become a drawback if not carefully handled, says Philip Fletcher, president and chief operating officer of ConAgra.

"Most families, especially when both spouses are employed, want quick, good-tasting food," he says. "But I specifically avoid the word convenient; we in the frozen-food business did ourselves a disservice by promoting our products as convenient only."

"The growth of alternative technologies doesn't mean the death of frozen foods," says Hormel's Mr. Bross.

"The demand for convenience foods is going to continue so strong that as shelf-stable and refrigerated foods explode, frozens probably will grow, too," he says. "But their rate of growth won't keep up with the growth in shelf-stable and refrigerated products."

What will be hurt are canned foods and restaurants, Ms. Roth says. "As consumers look for a better diet, I think the grocery store will be perceived as the best place to go to eat well." □

Eastern Europe beckons

An Advertising Age roundup

Western marketers, agencies and the media are lining up for a historic gold rush into East European markets now that the Iron Curtain is parting.

The immediate focus is on East Germany, whose consumers began a momentous shopping spree in West Berlin 10 days ago. But Berlin is just the beginning.

At an International Advertising Association conference in London last week and in separate interviews with Advertising Age, admen were focusing their sights on the Eastern bloc's emerging consumer market.

Colgate-Palmolive Co., which exports many products to Eastern European countries, including toothpaste and bar soap, is said to be thinking about setting up operations in Hungary, the Soviet Union and Poland, either through acquiring existing companies or start-ups.

During the opening of the Hungarian chapter of the IAA in September, Hungary's Deputy Prime Minister Peter Medgyessy told Colgate executive Clay Timon that "1992 is a train leaving the station, and Hungary wants to make it onto the last car."

Mr. Timon, New York-based VP-worldwide advertising, was a featured speaker at the IAA conference.

General Electric Co. last week became the first Western investor in Hungary since World War II with its purchase of light bulb manufacturer Tungsram, one of the country's largest companies.

Colgate archrival Procter & Gamble Co. is currently negotiating a joint venture to manufacture and distribute products in the Soviet Union.

P&G exports Crest and Blend-a-med toothpastes, Camay bar soap and Alo detergent to the Soviet Union and is eager to distribute other detergents, soaps and personal-care items to

Mighty minis roll into fray

By Raymond Serafin

There's nothing mini about the marketing war shaping up over minivans.

Ford Motor Co.'s Ford Division will break a campaign in late December for a new all-wheel-drive version of its Aerostar. That will follow this month's advertising launch of two new minivans, the Lumina APV and Silhouette, from General Motors Corp.'s Chevrolet and Oldsmobile divisions, respectively.

Early next year, GM's Pontiac division will start touting the new Trans Sport, with its first TV commercial likely to run on the Super Bowl broadcast.

The domestic automakers, which now dominate the segment, won't be fighting among themselves either.

Mazda Motor of America is making a dent in the minivan business with its stylish MPV, and Toyota Motor Sales USA is

PepsiCo serves up triple threat to McDonald's

By Scott Hume and Jennifer Lawrence

PepsiCo is about to introduce the restaurant industry to the 21st century—and step up the challenge to McDonald's Corp.

The world's largest restaurant operator next month will open a free standing unit with all three of its chains—Kentucky Fried Chicken, Pizza Hut and Taco Bell—under one roof.

The test unit, opening in the affluent Kansas City suburb of Overland Park, Kan., could provide efficiencies that deal with problems the $65 billion fast-food industry will face in the future. These include chronic shortages of labor and real estate sites.

More immediately, however, the three-in-one combination gives PepsiCo immediate marketing advantages by tripling the menu choices available to fast-food consumers, whose demand for variety

States win airline ad fight

NEW YORK—The states last week scored their first court victory in airline ad regulation. U.S. District Judge Robert W. Sweet ruled the state of New York isn't pre-empted from regulating airline ads and that the National Association of Attorneys General air travel guidelines can be enforced through state law. He dismissed most of Pan American World Airways and Trans World Airlines' claims. Judge Sweet also remanded to state court New York's actions against Pan Am and TWA. At press time, airline attorneys hadn't determined a course of action. The 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals is considering similar issues in a Texas case that went in the airlines' favor.

McCaffrey discusses buyout from Saatchi

By Jon Lafayette and Laurel Wentz

Saatchi & Saatchi Co., caught in a tightening financial vise, has agreed to discuss a management buyout of McCaffrey & McCall.

The negotiations come as London-based Saatchi is considering cutting its stock dividend and might be forced to take a sharp loss on one of its consulting investments.

Saatchi had been shopping McCaffrey & McCall, a $303 million New York agency, for months. Saatchi executives had refused to talk to McCaffrey management while seeking an outside buyer willing to pay the steep $30 million-to-$40 million price for the shop.

But "circumstances have changed," a source close to the deal said. "Discussions are going on."

McCaffrey Chairman Robert Cherins, who would lead the management group, last week would neither confirm nor deny that a buyout is being discussed.

Only weeks ago, Mr. Cherins said he knew nothing of any efforts to buy the agency.

Although no price has been agreed to, the management group has already contacted banks to borrow money, sources said, and some clients have been briefed on the discussions.

McCaffrey's biggest client, Mercedes-Benz of North America, declined to discuss the agency's plans, saying it doesn't comment on speculation.

The roots of Saatchi's apparent change of heart lie in the company's overall financial predicament.

"One might assess the financial health of the company as the issue," one source familiar with negotiations said. "One might assess the realization that they were not going to sell the consulting division companies as quickly or for as high a price as they had thought. It could be that the new ceo [Robert Louis-Dreyfus] is al-

Isuzu shop gains—really

By Cleveland Horton

Joe Isuzu will turn up the volume next year.

American Isuzu Motors on Jan. 1 will pull its regional ad budget into its national agency, Della Femina, McNamee WCRS, Los Angeles, creating an almost $100 million account.

The Japanese importer's regional advertising will top $20 million in 1990, said Fritz Kern, Isuzu VP-assistant general manager-marketing and planning.

Nationally, Isuzu will boost its ad budget about 15% to almost $80 million.

The move effectively eliminates the 67 independent Isuzu dealer regional associations. Their efforts will be assumed by seven regional Isuzu marketing managers.

In the past, regional advertising was jointly funded with the associations; now, Isuzu will pick up the entire bill.

For the 1991 model year, Isuzu is preparing a two-prong strategy to build image and product knowledge on the national level while concentrating on promotional, or tactical, efforts regionally.

Although fictional spokesman Joe Isuzu has helped the company gain overall awareness, "our research shows that consumers don't know as much about our products as they should," Mr. Kern said. He added that the character's future with the company's advertising is assured.

Although somewhat of a coup for Della Femina, the regional billings aren't all incremental for the agency. Currently, it handles about half of the dealer associations, including most of the biggest ad spenders.

The importer is following a precedent established by several other auto marketers, including Nissan Motor Corp. USA, which last year consolidated all regional marketing at its national agency, Chiat/Day/Mojo, Venice, Calif. □

Energizer bunny beats on

By Julie Liesse Erickson

Eveready's drumbeating pink bunny is advertising's hottest star, and agency Chiat/Day/Mojo is working on new ways to make the bunny a ubiquitous symbol of longer-lasting batteries.

Sources said new executions of Eveready Battery Co.'s Energizer bunny campaign could start as early as next month. Eveready broke its set of much-discussed TV spots—in which the bunny interrupts parody commercials—in October.

"There are an infinite amount of commercials that we could parody, dozens of things that the bunny could interrupt," said Tony Wright, VP-management supervisor at Chiat's Venice, Calif., office. "One of the key elements is surprise. Once consumers have seen these three commercials, we need to move onto something else."

In the first set, the bunny interrupts sinus remedy, coffee and wine commercials.

Bob Wolf, president of the office, said: "We would love to have the campaign so well-received that someday we could have the bunny appear on the 'Today' show or the 'Tonight Show' and have him walk across Bryant Gumbel's or Johnny Carson's desk, and we wouldn't have to explain it. That would be the ultimate."

The ultimate happened earlier than Mr. Wolf had planned when an imposter bunny made an appearance on the Nov. 16 "Late Night With David Letterman" show.

On the show, band leader Paul Shaffer alerted Mr. Letterman, "Hey! It's that cute Energizer bunny!" while a mock pink bunny —complete with Energizer logo— walked on the set.

But viewers knew it wasn't a commercial when Mr. Letterman knocked off the bunny's head with a baseball bat—and the bunny's body continued to writhe on stage.

The agency said Friday it had nothing to do with the Letterman stunt.

An Eveready spokeswoman said the company "was delighted" with the publicity. "All I can say is that the bunny keeps going and going . . . and we don't even always know where he's going to be next."

The bunny is being put to work officially outside TV, too. Sources said Eveready sees "tremendous" consumer interest in bunny promotions.

In a Nov. 12 free standing insert, Eveready launched a promotion offering a stuffed bunny for $14.95 with the purchase of Energizer batteries.

"You'll see a lot of merch- ..lising, promotions and point-of-sale materials with the bunny," the Eveready spokeswoman said. "He's hip; he's cool; he's a personality that people enjoy."

The Energizer bunny is leading the charge in all-purpose alkaline batteries, and Eveready has more than its estimated $25-million-to-$30-million ad budget riding on it.

Eveready and parent Ralston Purina Co. are using the Energizer to go head-to-head with Duracell, after two years of trying to segment the $3 billion market.

Industry observers generally believe Duracell has the upper hand in the market; it leads the alkaline battery segment with a 39.9% share, compared with Energizer at 36.1%, according to Nielsen Marketing Research Group figures for the July/August reporting period. □

In early 1985, Leonard H. Roberts, a Ralston Purina Co. vice president in search of funds for a management buyout of Ralston's foodservice division, boarded a plane to New York.

His seatmate that day was a woman named Renee Mottram. Mr. Roberts told her what he was up to.

She suggested that her boss, who had a certain fondness for acquisitions, might want to hear more about Mr. Roberts' plans.

Her boss, she said, was a man named Victor Posner.

Decision on dividend vital to Saatchi future

By Laurel Wentz and Jon Lafayette

When Saatchi & Saatchi Co. announces its yearend results Dec. 6, analysts will be watching for the one move that could put the company "in play."

Analysts believe that if London-based Saatchi cuts its dividend too far, it will cause the stock price to tumble and could set off bidding for the company.

New CEO Robert Louis-Dreyfus implied at a meeting with U.S. analysts early this month that he's not comfortable maintaining the dividend at the same level the company paid when Saatchi was more profitable.

At the same time, longtime Saatchi executives are believed to oppose a dividend cut, which would increase both shareholders' wrath and the company's vulnerability.

Saatchi paid a dividend of 7.4 pence per share two months ago for the first half of this year. A dividend of 8.6 pence, which would cost the company $21.5 million, was planned for the second half.

Cutting the dividend "would increase their vulnerability to takeover," said Neil Blackley, an analyst at U.K. stockbroker James Capel & Co. "I think the price would come back [down]. A compromise would be to write off everything that is prudent but maintain the dividend."

"There's definite friction between [Mr. Louis-Dreyfus] and the Saatchi old guard on the subject" of the dividend, said Emma Hill, analyst at Wertheim Schroder, New York.

Saatchi is still holding meetings about the write-offs and the dividend, and apparently hasn't made a final decision.

However, a recent story in the Evening Standard reporting analysts' impression that Mr. Louis-Dreyfus favored a dividend cut was altered in later editions to firmly rule out such a move.

Infiniti ads pull in traffic

An Advertising Age roundup

Nissan Motor Corp. USA's unconventional prelaunch campaign for Infiniti is having an impact.

An Advertising Age sampling of dealers across the country indicates the campaign is driving customers and the curious into showrooms.

The new upscale division officially began selling cars Nov. 8, following an intensive Zen-like campaign that never pictured the automobiles—the Q45 sedan and M30 sports coupe.

"I was very skeptical at the beginning," said Brian Kelly, principal of Roland Kelly Infiniti, Beverly, Mass. However, he said people began showing up at his dealership three weeks before it officially opened.

In the first week of business, more than 200 people entered the showroom, he said.

Wayne Wright, general sales manager of Grubbs Infiniti, Fort Worth, Texas, was another skeptical dealer: "I thought, 'If it doesn't show the car, the response will be bad.' But people thought it was a classy advertising campaign."

Some Infiniti dealers were skeptical at first, but now they say the unusual ad campaign is bringing in customers.

"The advertising clearly worked," said Robert Dekoy, sales manager at Loeber Imports, Chicago. "The number of people coming in here has been tremendous. It's been like the Auto Show here."

Mr. Dekoy acknowledged there was some chuckling early on over the TV spots from Hill, Holliday, Connors, Cosmopulos, Marina del Rey, Calif. "I think most people's first reaction was 'What the hey?' but after they saw them a few times, they got the idea."

Awareness of Infiniti ran high in the Cleveland suburb of Bedford, Ohio. While prospective customers at Motor Cars Infiniti split over whether they like the advertising, "they all remember it, and it has aroused their curiosity about the car," said Jeff Bleiweiss, general manager.

Infiniti of Beverly Hills, Calif., sold out its first allotment of $38,000 Q45s in just 10 days. "Eighty percent [of people drawn to the showroom] said they'd seen the commercials," said Jim Clarey, sales manager. "They said it was unusual, they'd never seen anything like it before."

He added that most people were

NCAA joins CBS sports roll

By Wayne Walley

Advertisers and agency executives are bracing for a new standard in sports ad packages now that CBS-TV has added the National Collegiate Athletic Association basketball tournament telecasts for the 1990s.

The $1 billion, seven-year deal cemented with the NCAA last week gives the network virtually year-round, top-name sports for years to come. CBS has the 1992 and 1994 Winter Olympics, National Football League national conference playoffs and baseball's league championships and World Series.

"It gives the network a lot more in the way of packaging opportunities, which can provide more pricing flexibility," said Joseph Ostrow, New York-based exec VP-corporate director of media for Foote, Cone & Belding.

Many observers believe CBS will use its stockpile of sports inventory to create annual and multi-year deals for more than just the big-name advertisers that use sports.

"The key is how CBS packages the whole operation," said a buyer who asked not to be identified. "Obviously, what is happening is that we are getting into a stratum of higher pricing that squeezes the middle group of advertisers."

The network is asking about $360,000 for a 30-second spot in the 1990 NCAA championship game, about 20% more than last year. Agency buyers said asking prices for other tournament games are already about 25% higher than last year, and they expect bigger jumps once the new contract takes effect.

Guidelines for beer advertising, the hottest topic of negotiations, almost became a non-issue after the NCAA softened its stance.

Jim Marchiony, NCAA director of communications, said the idea of imposing restrictions was dropped when Anheuser-Busch proposed a voluntary plan to run a balance of ads promoting both product and moderation starting this year.

The NCAA originally broached the idea of banning all beer ads, then talked of limiting beer to "educational" or moderation commercials. It finally settled on limiting the amount of beer spots to 60 seconds per hour. The deal reduces beer advertising by a third, meaning CBS will need to find other ad categories to fill the void.

The new NCAA deal, starting in 1991, is the second billion-dollar contract CBS has signed in less than a year. Last December, the network agreed to pay $1.06 billion for four-year rights to Major League Baseball.

CBS might have also considered the NCAA a necessary piece of the network's sports puzzle after it lost the rights to the National Basketball Association to NBC earlier this month. NBC snapped up rights to the NBA starting in the 1990-91 season for $600 million.

The NCAA price tag pushes the annual rights fee to an average of about $143 million a year, up a whopping 260%. □

TV appears on verge of new golden age

Ride 'em, cowboy... Westerns, once TV's most popular genre, are starting to corral viewers again. Although agency executives expected CBS' "Paradise" to draw a quick cancellation, the series is back in the saddle again, trying to turn Saturdays into a gunfight. ABC is high on "Young Riders," and NBC has its hopes riding on its "Desperado" movies.

Three out of four ain't bad... Producers Marcy Carsey and Tom Werner proved they aren't perfect when "Chicken Soup" didn't cook this fall. But few producers can lay claim to three top-rated series at the same time: "Roseanne," "Cosby" and "A Different World."

Going to the well... TV comedies usually grow stale and fade. Not NBC's "Cheers." Despite death, cast changes and syndication of early episodes, the series continues to serve up more laughs.

A little drama never hurts... First the famous Bryant Gumbel computer memo lambasting everyone on the "Today" show. Then the Deborah Norville intrigue. Finally, Jane Pauley's decision to leave her job by yearend. The "Today" plots almost come from "Dynasty," but the off-camera drama has given the NBC entry a new lease on life in the ratings race.

Outfoxed... Ever since Terry Rakolta turned an episode of "Married . . . With Children" into a national campaign to clean up TV, the Fox Broadcasting Co. comedy has become the fledgling network's biggest hit.

Let's be upfront about it... Despite TV's double-digit price increases, marketers bought 90% of the '89-90 prime-time space before the season started, or more than half the network's anticipated total ad revenues of $10 billion for '90.

Swinging for the fences... Following the long-form Porsche spots during the baseball playoffs, the big-bang commercial—somewhat dormant since "1984"—may be back on the roster.

Strange bedfellows... The networks, trying to woo viewers back to network prime-time, are entering Advertisers are rediscovering broadcast television, giving network, barter syndication and spot TV sellers a rosy outlook for the 1990s.

The robust sellers' market starts with the Big 3 networks. After a record-setting $3.8 billion upfront market for the 1989-90 prime-time season—or some 90% of the available inventory—ABC, CBS and NBC are understandably optimistic.

Add in Fox Broadcasting Co., and network TV reaped about $4.2 billion in upfront sales, an increase of more than 20% over last year.

Can the same thing happen next year?

"The dinosaurs have become dynamos," says an elated network executive, who believes a vigorous effort to market network time and a spending shift from promotion back to advertising resulted in the improved sales volume.

The ad volume rolled in despite network's shrinking share of the TV audience, albeit at a reduced rate, and a cost-per-thousand jump of from 12% to 18% for the new prime-time season. Chances are scatter prices in early 1990 will fetch even higher prices as almost all advertisers are picking up first-quarter and second-quarter options to buy time in all network dayparts.

"There's no reason why it shouldn't go on," says Larry Hoffner, senior VP-sales, NBC. "Television is a strong market. The money is there and it's a steady thing. Network time is not a 'house on fire' market."

A strong economy and a strong network marketplace also mean booming business for all of broadcast TV. With fewer network availabilities, marketers with TV advertising needs turn to alternatives such as barter syndication, cable and spot TV.

For 1990, the Television Bureau of Advertising forecasts a 7.1% increase in broadcast TV revenues. Syndication, starting from a smaller base, will show the largest percentage increase—15% to 17%, compared with 6% to 8% for network and local TV and 5% to 7% for spot, according to the forecast.

Fueling the robust market this year and providing optimism for 1990 is the massive marketing battle on the automotive front. The big-spending introductions of Nissan's Infiniti division and Toyota's Lexus were just two of the factors igniting a frenzied market this year. The addition of the new Saturn line from General Motors could create the same spending spree in 1990.

As an industry, the automakers increased upfront spending on the networks alone by some 75% and could commit even more in the winter, spring and summer if the fall marketing campaigns don't work.

While a bulk of the automotive ad budgets are being spent on network, sellers of ad time in syndicated shows and those representing local TV stations in the spot TV market say the car marketers also are pouring money into their respective areas.

TV sellers say other advertisers also seem to be re-discovering brand-building through advertising, eschewing the massive promotion expenditures of previous years.

"Almost to a person, the advertisers speaking at the Association of National Advertisers conference this year said they had to pull back on promotional spending and redress that balance," says Jim Joyella, president of TvB.

Many seem to be coming back to network TV with larger budgets. "The realization is that the networks, with their large reach, are important to have," says Jake Keever, exec VP-sales, ABC Television Network, New York.

The networks also are buoyed by their apparent success in halting or at least slowing audience erosion this year. The three-network audience share of prime-time during fall 1989 has hovered between 65% and 70%. Another factor is the three-network marketing efforts.

"We have to do more to prove our value, so we're spending the time putting presentations together to show the value of particular dayparts," says ABC's Mr. Keever. "It's a positive thing to sell network as the best mass media situation. We did get increases in price and now we have to establish in the minds of the Pure dynamite...TNT, also known as Turner Network Television, explodes onto the scene. Old movies have drawn large numbers of loyal viewers to this year-old network, which will add more sports programming in 1990.

Play it again... The public's seemingly insatiable appetite for sports has buoyed ESPN to the top of the subscription charts. Watch for the pitch it gives to its giant baseball broadcast package.

...and again... Regional sports networks will prove that there's nothing like root, root, rooting for the home team. New sales packages that combine these into mini-networks should play well with national advertisers.

Kudos for Kay and Co.... Kay Koplovitz' USA Network is watching its ratings escalate as it puts on more original programming and consistently refreshes its schedule.

Nothing but lousy reruns... Re-regulation could become the top issue next year. Sen. John Danforth (R., Mo.) reportedly is considering introducing legislation that would re-regulate subscriber rates, return more power to franchising authorities, reconfigure must-carry rules and reduce multiple systems operator size.

You must be kidding... Comedy Channel and Ha! TV Comedy Network will make a big splash next year. OK, so they're a little behind the boom in stand-up comedy clubs. But it's just about the right time for cocooning to work in the networks' favor as clubbers stay home.

Fine young cannibals... SuperStation WTBS' ratings and programming pizzazz are slipping, industry watchers agree, as TNT cannibalizes its audience and Turner executives concentrate resources on their younger star.

Bear market... Financial News Network has lost momentum on business news coverage to CNN. Agency executives now wonder whether it has narrowcasted itself into a corner.

So much for NBC's win streak... Consumer News & Business Channel, the NBC-owned cable startup, is considered unremittingly boring and production values need to be improved.

Hee-haw... The Nashville Network needs a boot in the overalls. But even with a good programming shot-in-the-arm, critics wonder whether its appeal is broad enough to generate momentum in the ratings.

The buyers' perspective

Upfront cable comes of age

By Judith Graham

The cable upfront buying market will sizzle in 1990.

Industry executives predict as much as $650 million in cable inventory will be sold on an upfront basis in the coming year, with "hot" networks and programs commanding sizable cost-per-thousand increases.

The reason, they say, is national advertisers' appetite for cable is healthier than ever, as is their desire to get their pick of increasingly appealing cable programming.

"More advertisers are looking at target marketing, and there are still more places where you can target on cable than on the [Big 3] networks. I think cable is going to have a super year," says Joseph Ostrow, worldwide media director, Foote, Cone & Belding.

According to Paul Kagan Associates, a leading cable researcher, cable network ad revenues are expected to jump 14.3% to $1.6 billion in 1990, compared with 1989.

The biggest ad growth categories for the industry will be regional sports networks, whose revenues should leap 35% to $100 million, and local advertising sold by cable operators, which is expected to climb 29.9% to $521 million.

With agencies increasingly anxious to snap up the best inventory as early as possible, the cable upfront market next spring for the 1990-91 broadcast season easily could top $650 million, says Larry Gerbrandt, VP-senior analyst at Kagan.

That would be a 30% increase over this year's cable upfront season, an activity whose strength caught both networks and agencies by surprise. The result was some networks underpriced inventory and some clients missed out on buys they had wanted.

Also, prices for popular inventory sold in the short-term "scatter" market soared, leaving clients and agencies determined not to be caught in the same position again.

The year before was the first one in cable's history to witness significant upfront activity, with $200 million in advance ad spending.

Most of the extra money in the 1990-91 cable upfront season will come from higher CPMs charged by cable networks, rather than a significant expansion of the inventory sold on an upfront basis, Mr. Gerbrandt says.

Robert Coen of McCann-Erickson predicts cable's CPMs will increase 8% in 1990 following a 10% increase in 1989. Mr. Gerbrandt declined to predict upfront CPM increases, saying only that the current 25% to 60% gap between network and cable CPMs would

The sellers' perspective

Original fare 'begins to blossom'

Hopes are running high among cable networks for an outstanding 1990, both in terms of advertising revenues and new programming advances.

Jack Bonanni, ESPN's senior VP-advertising sales, says, "1990 will be at least as good for cable as 1989, and 1989 has been staggering."

Network executives expect ad revenues for their side of the industry—excluding cable operators' local ad sales—to climb about 15% to 20% in 1990.

The surge will be fed in part by new commercial inventory and in part by cost-per-thousand increases.

Given an estimated $1.4 billion in cable network ad sales in 1989, that would place comparable 1990 advertising revenues somewhere between $1.61 billion and $1.68 billion.

Large amounts of new inventory will result from new cable ventures, including the launch this month of HBO's 24-hour "Comedy Channel," the April 1, 1990 premiere of MTV Networks' 24-hour "Ha! The TV Comedy Network," the anticipated 1990 launch of a sports news channel and the start-up of several regional sports cable networks that will be selling national advertising time.

Cost-per-thousand increases will be all over the lot, with some networks planning to raise prices an average 7% to 15% and others such as ESPN saying they will boost prices as much as 30% for high-demand programming such as first-run, exclusive shows.

While the potential for re-regulation of the industry looms, executives say the most important trend of 1990 will be the continued proliferation of original cable programming, which has demonstrated its ability to deliver both large audiences and command hefty CPM rates.

"After lots of dreams and promises, cable programming is finally beginning to blossom," says Gerry Hogan, president of Turner Broadcasting System's Entertainment Networks, responsible for SuperStation WTBS and Turner Network Television.

At Turner Broadcasting, that translates into a commitment to produce 30 original movies in 1990, compared with 15 in 1989, and to beef up documentaries at WTBS. TNT will run two original programs each month in 1990, compared with one for most of 1989, and four original programs monthly by 1991.

Mr. Hogan says WTBS' ad revenue increase should stay in line with that of the industry: Its ad increase will be 20% to 25%, while upstart TNT should amass 40% to 50% ad volume gains.

For ESPN, the big news of 1990 is the addition of 175 Major League Baseball games to its schedule, along with related programming such as a daily 30-minute highlight show called "Baseball Tonight."

Although baseball ad sales have started out slowly, ultimately they could prove a windfall for ESPN, which is charging a substantially higher CPM for baseball than it did for the inventory being replaced.

Among the ad categories showing substantial new energy for 1990, Mr. Bonanni says, are automobiles, national retailers, oil, tires and fast-food.

Gerry Hogan faces one heck of a juggling act next year.

As president of Turner Broadcasting System's Entertainment Networks, he needs to revive the sagging fortunes of WTBS SuperStation while nourishing the rapidly rising star of Turner Network Television.

The 43-year-old executive admits advertisers have expressed considerable confusion over the distinctions between the networks.

"The first thing we have to do [in 1990] is identify clearly the missions of each network—both the real and the perceived," he says. "TBS has been getting lost in the publicity we got for TNT."

An 18-year veteran of TBS who rose through the sales ranks, Mr. Hogan is acclaimed by cable industry insiders for engineering the startup of TNT, the single largest cable launch in history.

His biggest challenge in heading Turner's cable network operations has been reading through thousands of scripts and "dealing with creative people . . . learning how to motivate and excite them," he says. "It's a spectacular moment in cable," he adds, referring to the flood of original programming on networks such as TBS and TNT.

"Now, as each week goes by, we take another piece out of the pie [network] broadcasters built."

As if he didn't have enough to do, Mr. Hogan recently became president as well of Turner Pictures, a new division that will produce films for Turner cable networks and for theatrical release.

Menage a trois...Publishers, agencies and advertisers will link up in three-way marriages. Known as marketing partnerships, these are the latest evolution in the value-added program craze.

Expand your brand..."Operate what you got" is a key phrase for 1990 as media companies get back to basics and expand their franchises.

The Seven Brothers...Look for the launch of several general interest men's magazines. Cook's founder Christopher Kimball already has announced one, and media buyers are expecting many more to jump on the manwagon.

Multi-madness...Multi-fill-in-the-blank deals will come into their own. "Multi" is what's causing advertisers to foam at the mouth: Multi-title, multi-media, multi-national packages are multi-hot, hot, hot.

The price is right...Free and controlled circulation magazines, with their ability to reach narrowly defined target audiences at a price at which no subscriber can say "no," will benefit from the popularity of niche publications. They should finally shake their second-citizen status and gain some respect from advertisers.

Channeling...Chris Whittle: 'Nuff said.

Greenpiece...Publishers try to get a piece of the environmental movement with such magazines as Garbage, E, Buzzworm. Hot next year, but the books may end up in the dumpster if environmental fervor unexpectedly ages.

Talk to me, baby...Texas Instruments and Absolut vodka ads have more to say than the average magazine ad, and "plain" advertisers gripe about being overshadowed by them. The pop-up ad craze a couple years back indicates talkies will have a couple years before they lose their voice —unless publishers take too much heat from core advertisers.

Rolling it in...The cigarettes/tobacco/accessories category leaped 29.5% in first six months of 1989, the largest year-to-year increase among magazines' top 10 ad categories, according to Publishers Information Bureau.

The buyers' perspective

Only the 'smart' survive

By Scott Donaton

If magazine publishers don't start coming to media b yers with "smarter" rate cards, the pressure to negotiate rates off-the-card could escalate to an all-time high next year, say media buyers.

And "smarter" to media buyers means keeping rate increases lean, adjusting only for inflation—hardly good news to publishers.

"I'm not aware of any reasons publishers could give for big hikes," says John Gray, senior VP-director of media planning, J. Walter Thompson USA, New York. "They'll probably ask for larger increases than they'll end up getting, though. They know they have to negotiate downward, which has never been acceptable to them.

"If they ask for increases in the 7% to 8% range, there will be a lot of resistance from media buyers," he says. Mr. Gray, like most agency executives, expects consumer magazine rate hikes of 5% to 7% in 1990.

Unlike last year, no major postage or paper hikes are expected, and publishers would be hard-pressed to justify more than inflationary rate increases, they say. Yet, agency executives predict some publishers will raise their rates as high as 8% to 12%, expecting to negotiate downward.

That padding strategy, which many publishers believe makes them seem more efficient in the buyers' eyes, actually could backfire. "We're like a greedy animal. The more [publishers are] willing to come to us with a flat rate and negotiate, the more they'll encourage us," says Scot Butler, media director at Fallon McElligott, Minneapolis.

Mr. Butler suggests magazines make their rate cards "smarter. Make the rate more intelligent before you come to us. I find it hard to be sympathetic to magazines in this world of rate cutting."

Fear among publishers is that rate negotiation reduces all magazines to a common denominator based on quantitative rather than qualitative factors. "Baloney," suggests Nancy Smith, senior VP-director of media services at Young & Rubicám, New York. "Negotiations will not cause magazines to become commodities. It does not suggest that all products have the same value."

Ironically, buyers say magazines that resist rate negotiation risk being viewed as commodities: "There is some degree of substitutability. Where there's an opportunity to strike a better deal with a competing publication, we'll go for it," says Mr. Gray.

Agency executives also are seeking to increase their involvement in marketing partnerships with their clients and the media.

The sellers' perspective

Longing looks at the rate card

Convinced that quality editorial and strong marketing partnerships will unite to defeat rate-cutting pressures, magazine publishers say they are turning an optimistic eye toward 1990.

But their long faces tell a different story.

Ad revenues alone seemingly point to a bonanza among consumer magazines. Advertising reached $4.6 billion through the first three quarters—up 12% over the same period in 1988 and on pace to easily surpass the $5.9 billion spent in magazines in 1988. And next year looks even better, publishers say.

Yet, beneath these tallies, calculated at rate-card prices, surfaces the dark question: What are the real figures given publishers' tendency to negotiate at less-than-published rates?

The fact is agency executives are far from ready to ease negotiation pressure. The magazine industry, while healthy and growing, still has a fight on its hands.

That pressure has led publishers to reexamine their editorial product and to put together creative ad packages.

Time Inc. Magazine Co. officials say the division's 2-year-old corporate Max Plan discount program has pulled greater advertising into its publications, particularly the weeklies. Under the Max Plan, advertisers earned credits toward bonus space if they increased their share of their media budget devoted to Time Inc. magazines.

Conde Nast Publications, which has resisted pressure to discount rates on or off its rate card, will introduce "Conde Nast Package of Women" next year. The program awards discounts to advertisers who buy space in any four or five of the company's women's magazines.

Times Mirror Magazines also launched a new $1 million trade campaign from FCB/Leber Katz Partners, promoting its package of special-interest men's magazines.

Other companies such as Time Warner and Meredith Corp. are developing multi-media and multi-national deals for advertisers, hoping value-added programs will convince agency executives to stop focusing on rates.

"Rate negotiation and heavy discounting of magazine ad space threatens to commoditize advertising and reduce magazine profits," says Donald Kummerfeld, president of Magazine Publishers of America. "We must resist this trend and focus our sales efforts on why magazines are unique."

Magazine sellers must prevent buyers from judging their properties as essentially being the same, says George Green, president, Hearst Magazines International. "I think we'll get advertisers to recognize that they only get what they pay for."

For 1990, many publishers are reaching for rate increases somewhere in the 5% to 7% range, down from 1988's average 8%-plus increases. They insist their costs are rising and that they're still paying for last year's high paper and postal hikes.

But many publishers, recognizing that major rate increases will only invite more pressure to nego-

Since then—particularly in recent months—the former CBS Magazines senior VP has beefed up the unit through acquisitions at a time when most major magazine companies are concentrating on expanding their core franchises.

"We are building a structure to support a much larger magazine company . . . publishing between 10 and 20 magazines within five years," Mr. Ryder says.

Not bad for a company whose only purpose not so long ago was to publish a giveaway publication for American Express cardholders. That magazine was Travel & Leisure, which became the leading travel magazine in both circulation and ad pages under the guidance of Pamela Fiori, recently named the company's first editorial director by Mr. Ryder.

In September, the company took on responsibility for Departures, a magazine for American Express Platinum Card holders, and relaunched it with a new look and focus. Last month, it acquired Atlanta from MetroCorp.

American Express, which also publishes L.A. Style, New York Woman and Food & Wine, will actively pursue city magazine acquisitions in 1990 while examining launches, possibly of city magazines or in categories not now covered by its stable of titles.

"We're interested in quality metropolitan magazines in major markets; we'll put together packages where they make sense," he says.

Mr. Ryder says his goal is to offer advertisers a wide menu to choose from, sensible group buys and a presence in the top markets. He predicts that through expansion and nurturing his titles into the top magazines in their fields, he can raise the publishing group's revenues from a projected $135 million in 1989 to more than $500 million in five years.

Call it CHurban radio... The mix of R&B hits and contemporary hit radio announcers is bridging all ethnic gaps and creating crossover profits for FMs trying to reach that ever elusive 18 to 34 male and female demo.

Learning from PBS... Advertisers are turning to programming sponsorship and tie-ins and away from sole reliance on traditional 30-second spots. The thought is that if a popular announcer on a popular program sells a product, audiences will find the message more credible.

Divine intervention?... Some prayers have been answered and network radio is a hot commodity again as advertisers realize TV means big bucks and cable means no national reach.

Therefore, it logically follows... Spot is hot. For the reasons just mentioned why network is hot—and with network radio time increasingly sold out—advertisers are turning to spot as a way to move those unsightly products before the new ones arrive.

Bickering over Bach... Los Angeles citizens' group, riled by KKBT-FM's format switch from classical to contemporary hit radio, petitions the FCC to revoke KKBT's license. The squabble started when Evergreen Communications bought the station for 22 times cash flow—typical sale is 10 times—only to opt for the Bee Gees.

Getting what ya pay for..."Zookeeper" Scott Shannon, the irreverent disk jockey, was lured from WHTZ-FM, NY, to KQLZ-FM, LA, for $2 million earlier this year. KQLZ's market share has since climbed from 13th to 4th.

Spanning the nation... Two major Spanish-language radio station groups—Viva America Media Group and Radio Nacional—just formed by combining leading stations in different markets. Their purpose is to boost the medium's profile among advertisers and agencies—and jack up rates in the process.

All you ever wanted—and more... Demographic fine-tuning is hitting its stride. Examples abound: all-business radio pioneered in Los Angeles by KMNY-AM; all-sports WFAN-AM in New York; all-Asian music format by KAZN-AM in Los Angeles; all-black talk station WVON-AM in Chicago; all-self-help station WWNN-AM in Pompano Beach, Fla.

Second ad tier changes gears

By Anne Moncreiff Arrarte

Radio sellers like nothing better than to see TV costs-per-thousand escalate. Higher TV rates mean more advertisers will turn to radio, particularly medium-sized clients that cannot afford "big-splash" TV buys, sellers theorize.

And theory is translating into reality, radio buyers claim.

"We're using radio very actively now, often as an overlay with network television," says Robert Hielscher, senior partner at Tatham-Laird & Kudner, Chicago, which represents Miles Inc.'s One-A-Day and Flintstones vitamins. "We're putting a couple of million [dollars] per brand in radio because radio is very effective in extending our reach to light television viewers."

Buyers also note consistent spending from radio's traditional advertisers. Packages that include value-added promotional tie-ins and "reasonable" rate increases also portend well for the medium, they say.

In fact, radio is riding into 1990 on the heels of a strong 1989 performance for spot, national and local radio.

Through the first eight months of the year, advertising revenues on network radio had grown 10.6%, spot 11.3% and local 7.9% compared with the similar period in 1988, according to the Radio Advertising Bureau. The bureau is revising its full-year estimates to reflect the higher-than expected results.

"The medium-size accounts definitely will be doing more in radio this coming year," says Jill Gordon, VP-network group director for DDB Needham Worldwide, New York, which handles radio buys for Volkswagen of America and many of Campbell Soup Co.'s food lines.

"Ore-Ida Foods will be going in new—as a tie-in with television—and Campbell and Volkwagen radio budgets are going up. On an agency level, we'll be up 10% if not more."

A dramatic increase in scatter buys—flights usually bought for three to four weeks—explains a lot of radio's 1989 success, says Mark Kaline, senior VP, media manager broadcast planning for Chevrolet at Lintas:Campbell-Ewald, Warren, Mich.

He attributes the heavy scatter largely to automakers trying to move inventories with incentive advertising at mid-year, and the hotel industry trying to emulate Motel 6's success with the medium. Similarly, Sears, Roebuck & Co. has been a heavy scatter buyer in pushing its Discover credit card and "everyday low pricing" policy launched after the upfront season.

The sellers' perspective

Tie-ins sounding sweeter than ever

Radio has caught the same fever as other media: value-added madness.

Whether manifested through special programs, tour sponsorships or other tie-ins, value-added programs are helping radio reverse the nightmarish growth picture of two years ago and causing radio sellers to project double-digit growth in 1990.

ABC Radio Network, radio's largest network, this year opened a Tour Sponsorshop department, hooking into the Rolling Stones Steel Wheels tour on its maiden effort. ABC tour updates on affiliates across the country have included the standard on-air and signage packages and parties for clients in major cities on the tour.

The network never imagined the tour could be such a success, says Louis Severine, senior VP-director of sales, adding the sponsorship has resulted in a stronger affiliate base.

On schedule for 1990 is a Tour Mall 1990 promotion with Dick Clark and American Bandstand.

Westwood One's 3½-year-old Tour division and the recently formed Music Marketing division offer packages that include sponsorship, affiliated station events and tie-ins, venue signage and handouts. "Next year a lot of advertisers will sponsor long-form programs," says William Battison, president-chief financial officer. "We are dedicated to helping our advertisers get more for their money."

Along with value-added offerings has come a more aggressive sales stance as networks and individual stations are emphasizing strong research that clearly defines their listening audience.

That, says Steve Youlious, VP-sales, CBS Radio Network, has brought a lot of confidence to the medium.

"We're spending almost as much on qualitative consumer research as on advertiser promotion, and that is new," says Skip Finley, president-ceo of Albimar Communications, which owns KDAB-FM in Salt Lake City and WKYS-FM, Washington. WKYS also has added sales innovations including the advertising-directed KYS Connection, a phone number listeners can dial for headline news, cultural calendar and soap opera update, all of which are sandwiched between advertisers' spots.

More advertisers are turning to radio to bolster exposure levels for their ad messages, say radio sellers. Because TV clutter affects commercial exposure, more cli-

E.J. "Jay" Williams

In only a year at the helm of Sheridan Broadcasting Network, the top black-owned radio network, President E.J. "Jay" Williams has become adept at overselling.

"That is what it takes to introduce advertisers to the $250 billion black market," says Mr. Williams, who came to his new post from the research department armed with "just about every legitimate concrete source I could find."

Mr. Williams has helped expand Sheridan's audience in the urban radio market 40% and its client base 50% largely through the launching of two more tandem networks—STRZ Entertainment Network and SPM Radio Network.

"But we also remind buyers that the black consumer market is part of a bigger market, and they buy us because our penetration delivers," he says.

Sheridan listeners are 78% black, although non-black listenership is on the rise. Programming on the new networks reflects this premeditated push toward cultural diversity.

On STRZ, Anne Lineberger holds court daily with a "Money Smarts" personal finance show. Franco Harris, former running back with the Pittsburgh Steelers, hosts "NFL Playbook," a daily five-minute show carried not only on urban black radio, but many country western stations.

SPM Radio Network, a joint venture with Starstream Communications, is currently producing "Exitos Calientes" (Hot Hits), which will offer a mix of Tejano, Mexican and current Latin hits.

Programming has been combined with market-driven ad packages such as a Chevrolet promotion tied to black college homecomings.

While Sheridan remains well grounded in urban radio's largely black audience, Mr. Williams' vision is decidedly cross-cultural. Next up is a sports network at Sheridan.

'Let's haggle about that price'

By Janet Meyers

Events in the newspaper industry will bolster the axiom, "What goes up, must come down."

Advertisers and media buyers estimate newspaper ad rates will rise 5% to 6% in 1990. But they also see a dramatic increase in negotiation and newly created discounted rate packages.

Dealing off the rate card may not be enough to reverse the medium's fortunes, as most buyers are not sanguine about newspapers' health. They expect newspaper circulation in 1990 to continue its slow, steady decline. And they hope newspapers haven't awakened too late to the need to develop more sophisticated sales techniques.

Negotiations will center on discounts for frequency, zoning and newly created ad categories.

Bob Mitchell, senior VP-director of local media for Lintas: Campbell-Ewald, Warren, Mich., is predicting a 6% rate increase for 1990, but says he will negotiate for additional special rates.

In 1989, he negotiated rate reductions by convincing newspapers to add a travel sub-category (for national advertisers) at rates lower than national levels. This amounted to an off-the-rate card buy couched in new terminology for clients such as Eastern Airlines and Princess Cruises.

Sub-categories may just be another way to get more business today through discounting, but Joe Lafferty, chairman of Branham Newspaper Sales, predicts that national not only will splinter into categories in the next decade, but that rates will vary by season.

"We're going to put additional pressure" on negotiating lower rates, says Mr. Mitchell. "We're looking at new options within the newspaper category, such as zoning or repeat space buys to make it less expensive."

Many advertisers expect to devote the same or slightly less of their 1990 total media budget to newspapers. Charles Jacoby, national advertising director at Silo, an electronics chain that will spend about $50 million in newspapers this year, says his company's newspaper budget will increase in proportion to the retailer's expansion.

Auto marketers will continue to devote significant chunks of their budgets to newspapers, unless there's a trend back to image advertising, believes Mr. Mitchell. Their current emphasis on rebates and interest-rate deals demands detailed explanations more easily implemented in print than broadcast.

Karen Ritchie, senior VP-director of media, McCann-Erickson Detroit, says newspaper buys in 1990 will be flat or slightly down.

The sellers' perspective

Manageable costs, more frills

Newspaper ad executives are braced for 1990 to be a mirror-image of 1989: a tough battle to increase advertising revenue and pages.

The one known bright spot is a decrease in newsprint prices, providing a savings that may be passed along to advertisers or at least result in lower rate increases.

Newspapers will redouble efforts to attract smaller advertisers. They also will offer lower rates for preprinted inserts, because they continue to lose business to ADVO-Systems Inc. and other saturation mailers. Rate cards also will be more flexible, changing over the course of the year.

At the Milwaukee Journal and Sentinel, ad rates will increase 6% next year, compared with a 7% hike in 1989, says Journal Co. VP-Advertising Beverly Klein. The Journal and Sentinel will offer a multiple insertion discount to those who buy several weekly pages, targeting smaller retailers that don't qualify for large volume discounts but could be enticed to advertise more frequently.

Fred Crisp, VP-sales and marketing for the Raleigh, N.C., News & Observer, says the paper will continue to woo smaller advertisers through cheaper zoned additions, often just a single, preprinted sheet inserted into the regular paper.

"That's an area that's pretty lucrative—or can be," says Mr. Crisp. "Once you get those advertisers in, they become regular customers."

Some newspapers won't increase ad rates for preprinted inserts to win back business from direct mail. Department stores in particular have shifted money from newspapers into catalogs mailed to their credit-card lists.

For example, the St. Petersburg (Fla.) Times will raise ad rates 5.5% next year, but hold to 1989 rates for preprints, says Al Corey, Times advertising director.

The paper also is developing new marketing products, targeting either a segment of the population or a geographic area.

This year the newspaper launched "Seniority," a quarterly tabloid section for mature readers, a large portion of the St. Petersburg market. The section will increase its frequency this year and eventually become monthly, Mr. Corey says. The Times also is targeting tourists by pairing its weekly TV section with a Tampa/St. Petersburg hotel guide.

Mr. Corey predicts 1990 will show modest gains in advertising—more modest than in the past few years. "We're having a nice year [this year], but not a great year," he says.

Dennis Atkin, VP-advertising Long Beach (Calif.) Press-Telegram, says daily ad rates will increase comparable to previous years, 5% to 6%. Sunday rates will rise 7% to 8% because of circulation gains, he says. In September the Press-Telegram—combined with the Torrance Daily Breeze—launched a new national package buy, dubbed the "Coastal Combo," which offers 260,000 daily circulation in Los Angeles County.

For 1990, Mr. Atkin expects "small, real growth in volume and a fairly decent year for revenue." Volume has been flat in 1989, he says, while revenue has grown slightly.

Part of newspapers' problem has been a softening in classified advertising after double-digit increases in each of the last three

As publisher of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, Nicholas Penniman IV has his work cut out for him.

Not only is St. Louis "not the most ebullient of economies" as he dryly points out, but the P-D faces competition from the nation's first new mass-market urban daily in years. Ingersoll Publications' St. Louis Sun began publishing in September and went straight for the P-D's advertisers and readers.

While the P-D's circulation has increased in recent months, advertising is down. The P-D has lost one advertiser, Coldwell Banker, to the Sun.

But equally prominent on the worry list of 51-year-old Mr. Penniman is encroachment from direct marketers, who have eaten away at the paper's lucrative preprinted insert business. Mr. Penniman doubled the volume of inserts in recent weeks after slashing preprinted prices 45% on the paper's Wednesday total market coverage section.

Next year, Mr. Penniman says he will fight back on all fronts with a modest overall advertising rate increase of 2% to 3%, down from the average hike of 5% in 1989.

He also promises to take on the Sun with his paper's most extensive promotion ever. A TV campaign via newly assigned D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles breaks early next year.

Nicholas Penniman IV

He also plans to continue to tinker with the paper's editorial; its sports, features and business sections were expanded last August.

Also as senior VP-newspaper operations for Pulitzer Publishing Co., Mr. Penniman oversees the Tucson Star and suburban Chicago papers.

Forced to fish in new waters

Outdoor Advertising

By Alison Fahey

Outdoor is slowly emerging from an identity crisis suffered three years ago when liquor and tobacco, its two mainstay ad categories, slashed their outdoor spending and shattered the medium's sense of security.

National outdoor revenues, which slipped 2% to $600 million in 1986, has recorded only 2% annual growth since, according to Robert J. Coen, McCann-Erickson.

By mid-year 1989, national had managed only an 0.9% gain over the same period in 1988—a stark reminder of what can happen to a business that operates from a narrow base.

Shaken by these events, outdoor companies have adopted a more marketing-oriented approach to selling the medium. The end result, according to Mr. Coen, has been 6.3% growth in local outdoor in 1988 vs. 1987, generated partly by an expanding client base.

"We should have been doing it all along," laments Joe Cherry, national sales manager, Naegele Outdoor. "The big bucks rolling in from tobacco companies gave the industry a false sense of security."

Yet sellers remain anxious, and for good reason.

At presstime, neither R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co. nor Brown & Williamson Tobacco Corp. had made major commitments for 1990. Observers can't remember a time when such buys were so tardy. B&W is planning select buys, and RJR says it remains in a planning mode. As a result, many avails are open for 1990.

"It is obvious the mega-mergers and acquisitions are hurting our industry as well as others," says Mr. Cherry, referring to last year's buyout of RJR/Nabisco and the current attempt by Sir James Goldsmith to take over B.A.T. Industries PLC, parent of B&W.

Despite this unknown quantity, outdoor players are expecting growth of 6% to 8%—the uptick expected to come from new business—on moderate price increases of 4% to 6%.

Off-rate-card negotiations, which may be more prevalent in 1990 than this year, could negate some of that increase.

Outdoor companies have started to aggressively target the package goods, retail, financial institutions and healthcare categories. Abetting the industry's cause is the declining reach of TV and newspapers.

"We'll continue to see the power shift from advertisers to retailers and more and more programs that have importance on the local level," says James Keller, divisional VP-marketing, Gannett

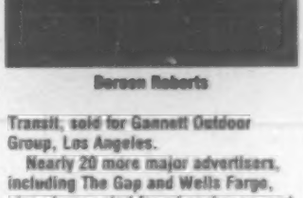
Doreen Roberts has a driving passion for her favorite medium.

Ms. Roberts, VP-general sales manager of Gannett Transit, has convinced advertisers to look at out-of-home as ad packages that can include outdoor boards, subway posters and bus shelter advertising.

This new way of selling outdoor was part of the reason Gannett Outdoor purchased New York Subway Advertising in 1988. And the 36-year-old Ms. Roberts first put the concept into practice in November 1988 with Acapulco Restaurants, a company that had refused several previous Gannett proposals for traditional out-of-home placements.

"I said, 'Just give me one more chance . . . I came up with a package and they bought it,' " says Ms. Roberts, who before joining Gannett Transit, sold for Gannett Outdoor Group, Los Angeles.



Doreen Roberts

Nearly 20 more major advertisers, including The Gap and Wells Fargo, since have opted for ad packages, and renewals have been strong, she says.

Such multiple deals are expected to become 20% of Gannett Transit business in 1990. Ms. Roberts predicts they'll become the norm at Gannett.

The buyers' perspective

Talk cheap, but marketers still flock to net TV first

By Wayne Walley

Marketers and media directors say money previously earmarked for promotions is starting to flow back into advertising budgets for 1990. And they're not exactly elated that the chief beneficiary will be broadcast TV.

By increasing demand for network, syndication and spot TV, the advertisers are helping create a robust seller's market with price increases outpacing inflation.

"When you are in a supply-and-demand business, why sell something at a 6% increase if people will pay 12%," Bill Croasdale, senior VP-director of national broadcast, Backer Spielvogel Bates, New York, said when network prices soared last summer.

As a result, media buyers wonder if the trend could have long-term detrimental implications.

"Our clients are strong devotees of network; it is an essential commodity," says Richard Kostyra, exec VP-director of U.S. media services, J. Walter Thompson USA, New York. "But it's almost a love-hate relationship. As soon as there is an alternative, it will be difficult to withhold a client from eagerly going after it."

While many marketers talk about shifting money from network to other media including cable TV, "unwired" networks, barter syndication, radio and print, those same advertisers are buying huge chunks of network time.

In the automotive category, for example, more than 40 brands compete for market share. A company has little choice but to use network TV.

Agency executives concede that despite eroding audiences, network TV offers enormous reach compared with its competitors.

"As long as national broadcast is out there, you have to be there to move your product or sell your services. It's that simple," says a chagrined media buyer.

"When you look at network TV, the question is why is it sold out to the extent that it is," says Douglas Seay, VP-director of broadcast programming, Hal Riney & Partners, New York. "Ratings continue to dwindle. Alternatives are available. Syndication is healthy and doing well. 'Star Trek' is like a network show. 'Entertainment Tonight' is like a network show. They even deliver some demographics better.

"But there is some cachet about network programming that makes it attractive to advertisers over and above its value," he says, adding visibility, not price, is sometimes more important. "You can tell a client you're running 500 gross rating points a week, but he only understands that intellectually. If his kid comes home and says three classmates saw the commercial, that's much better."

The networks will continue to be the core of most major advertisers' media plans because high-reach, high-profile mass communication builds brand awareness, says Mr. Kostyra. "Niche vehicles are then used to augment, not replace, the mass media buy."

Bargains, budget and need can downplay network. When bargains are available in syndication or spot TV, Chuck Bachrach, exec VP-director of network at Western International Media, Los Angeles, says he is quick to shift monies from network.

Other traditional network users for various reasons are allocating larger budgets to network competitors. Chrysler Motors will spend about 70% of its estimated $50 million budget on print for 1990 model-year advertising for Chrysler brand, up from 40% last year.

Other advertisers just want a cheaper alternative. Campbell Soup Co. will likely emphasize network radio, in-store advertising and cable and syndication in the future at network TV's expense, says George Marhlig, Campbell's director of media services.

But even though food companies are especially concerned when media prices climb faster than the consumer price index, he says Campbell cannot afford to completely ignore network TV.

Generally, most agency executives expect "healthy" TV spending in 1990.

"Beyond that, I don't know," says Joe Ostrow, exec VP-corporate director of media, Foote, Cone & Belding, New York. "There's more aggressiveness from competitors."

But fractionalization of media has forced the major media to work harder to service advertisers and prove value.

Many applaud the new network willingness to try new things such as the CBS/K mart Corp. fall season promotion and NBC/Sears, Roebuck & Co. sweepstakes.

An emphasis on working with advertisers—marketing the TV media instead of selling time—is helping syndication and spot TV.

"Taking advantage of the tie-ins now offered is only the tip of the iceberg," says Mr. Ostrow. "If the networks are sold, spending does shift to cable, syndication and spot. But in syndication there are a couple of shows that do great and a lot of other stuff that has inadequate performance. Spot is mercurial. But these other things help."

The future step, some believe, is the end of distinctions between different TV media.

"We'd like to see the advertising industry as a whole . . . begin to think in broader terms about electronic media instead of thinking about network TV and syndicated TV and VCRs separately," said Louis Schultz, exec VP, director of media services for Lintas:USA in a speech earlier this year.

"I'd like to see us thinking of them as one wonderful menu . . . that gives us new and exciting ways to reach our potential customers in the 1990s and beyond." □ buyers that they got the value."

CBS also was more than pleased with its "Get Ready Giveaway" promotion with K mart Corp. CBS executives say the promotion, coupled with the network's fall ad campaign, helped significantly increase ratings for the new shows vs. 1988 premieres.

George Schweitzer, senior VP-communications for CBS Broadcast Group, says several marketers are likely to join the network in future cross-promotions including programs as large or on a smaller scale as the K mart deal in 1990.

"We're just getting involved with tie-ins, joint ventures, promotions, merchandising and marketing," says NBC's Mr. Hoffner, referring to NBC's fall sweepstakes promotion with Sears, Roebuck & Co.

While the networks are gaining confidence for the 1990s, syndicators believe the next decade will bring parity with the networks.

"Syndication has some of the most popular shows in almost every daypart and we've demonstrated that we can reach the audiences advertisers need," says George Back, Advertiser Syndicated Television Association president and president of All-American Television. "We're a big part of the change that's going on in television."

Advertisers are beginning to realize there has to be a blurring of the distinction between network and syndication, says Marc Hirsch, president, Premier Advertiser Sales. "The viewers don't know one from the other, they just know it's a program they want to watch.

"It was a terrific year for network and the same is happening for syndication," he says, adding that the gap is closing between network and syndication rates in some time-periods such as late night and on some specific properties. " 'Arsenio Hall' is commanding more money out of the market than 'Pat Sajak,' " Mr. Hirsch says.

He expects male-oriented and dual-audience programs to help syndication attract new ad categories such as insurance companies.

" 'Star Trek' was the door opener," he says. "People looked at the numbers and realized other than 'L.A. Law,' this show reaches more men age 18 to 49 than any other hour series on television."

Expecting more program successes, ASTA predicts barter syndication revenues in 1990 will reach a record $1.25 billion, $200 million more than 1989. Tim Duncan, ASTA's executive director, says syndication areas of strength continue to grow, particularly in CBS won't broadcast its first Winter Olympic Games until 1992. But J. Larre Barrett, the network's new VP-Olympic marketing and sales, already is stalking major advertisers to sponsor telecasts of both the 1992 and 1994 Winter Games.

Just how well CBS can sell its Olympic inventory could not only give the network a better way to sell its regular time but affect the network's future bids for sporting events. CBS has found Major League Baseball, for which it paid $1.06 billion, a tough sell. If CBS can't sell the Olympics, the network might believe it can't afford to buy the big sports.

"The Olympics are a concept sell. You have to have the ability to talk to clients perhaps at a different level of understanding of marketing," Mr. Barrett says.

Doug Goodman

J. Larre Barrett

"You have to show clients the advantages network television offers that other mediums don't. That's selling by concept, selling by ideas and translating it into marketing a product," he says. "The Olympics have been in that category all along."

Mr. Barrett, a veteran of six Olympic selling seasons during his 24-year tenure at ABC, joined CBS in February.

"It was a natural move," he says. "CBS didn't have any experience selling Olympics. I had a lot of experience and a love for the Olympics."

At CBS, he is attempting to push the boundaries of marketing support. The network will make its on-air sports personalities available for client meetings or as hosts of special videotapes. The network will produce corporate newsletters and lapel pins and offer print opportunities in Olympic guides it produces and free-standing inserts.

Mr. Barrett is trying to broaden the universe of Olympic advertisers, taking the package to possible sponsors that will be more likely to buy time if it is laced with incentives. These new customers could make or break the bottom line.

This is different from past Olympics where such add-ons were done in bits and pieces but not assembled in an upfront, customized package.

"I want to, in essence, present clients with a marketing/promotion program that allows them to pick and choose the elements they feel will work for individual marketing objectives," he says.

"It's never been done in the Olympics before and it could help bring in advertisers who otherwise couldn't afford to be in the Olympics," Mr. Barrett says. "That's the reason we created this marketing program. It's going to be, I think, a prototype for other events."

Ken Better is playing the odds that more companies will shift spending out of national promotions into regional and local programs in the next decade.

As VP-new marketing and business development at MMT Sales, a spot TV sales rep for 59 stations across the country, his goal is to offer advertisers a way to coordinate media, advertising, promotion and marketing events with local, regional and national spot TV, regional print and local point-of-purchase advertising.

MMT, owned by Meredith Corp., publishers of such titles as Better Homes & Gardens and Ladies' Home Journal, can combine spot TV with print to jump-start both media and offer advantages against competitors selling single media packages.

"A TV commercial could be customized to tie in with a program in a certain market. Then Better Homes & Gardens has 144 local or regional editions that can be customized with market-specific copy, coupons or include a list of participating retailers. We can also publish customized booklets using the magazine name and logo that can be used for in-store displays. There's a lot of ways we can go," he says.

Mr. Better learned the spot TV business during a 14-year stint with Peters, Griffin, Woodward, a now-defunct rep company folded into Corinthian Communications.

Mr. Better once started his own TV monitoring company, but he sold it to Broadcast Advertisers Reports after five years. He most recently worked for AlphaTex, a marketing services company, before joining MMT last year.

"What makes us unique from other rep firms is that we have the resources to do these things within our own company," says Mr. Better, who started the new department at MMT in July.

Premier Advertiser Sales, the new kid in TV syndication, already is a force to be reckoned with.

Formed by merging the TV syndication sales teams of Paramount and MCA, Premier likely will command more than 20% of the $1.2 billion in projected barter sales in 1990.

The only thing that could change the picture is if Premier tries to become a "fifth network" instead of the country's largest purveyor of barter syndication advertising time.

Before that could happen, however, affiliates of Fox Broadcasting Co. would have to reverse their initial rejection of Premier's network proposal. Without the Fox affiliates, Premier would lack national coverage.

But Marc Hirsch, president of the new venture, believes no matter what the combined entity calls itself, Premier already has a unique place in the TV industry.

"There isn't anyone else out there selling barter syndication that has the kind of ownership to even think about doing the things we can," says Mr. Hirsch.

With the top-rated syndicated shows in late-night ("Arsenio Hall"), action/adventure hours ("Star Trek: The Next Generation"), first-run comedies ("Charles in Charge") and movie packages, Premier does have network-style clout, albeit on a smaller scale.

Although Mr. Hirsch is coy about future plans, it is believed Premier is contemplating package deals similar to networks or could create a hybrid way to meet advertisers' needs.

"Our job is to look for ways to increase the overall value of what we sell, not simply charge more money for it," he says.

daytime, early fringe and late fringe time periods.

The trickle-down effect of a strong network market also has helped spot TV, giving local station rep firms reason to expect healthy sales in 1990.

"The glory days of double-digit revenue increases ended a couple of years ago, but we might be looking at 6% to 8% increases in the next couple of years, and that's better than the 2% to 4% growth of the last few years," says Ken Better, VP-marketing and business development, MMT Sales, New York.

A key to spot TV's improved sales outlook is the return of package-goods marketers.

"The corporations have started to have a resurgence: the P&Gs, the Levers and more," says Tim McAuliff, president-chief operating officer, Blair Television.

While automakers have remained strong buyers of spot TV, movies unable to land network scatter spots also have contributed heavily. "It's been a tremendous category for us," Mr. McAuliff says. "They are perfect for spot."

Unwired networks also have grown out of the spot TV market, giving local stations a vehicle to vie with networks and barter syndicators for national ad dollars.

"Spot can be difficult and expensive for some people," says Mr. McAuliff. "With an unwired network, we can provide advertisers with one invoice, the sales and the support they need. More often than not it gives us a way to compete with barter." □ close "a little bit."

Agencies already anticipate the need to move more quickly to secure desired commercial inventory when the upfront market opens next May or June.

"We probably will get in a little sooner this year," says Kathleen Lawson, VP-group director, Advanswers, a media-buying unit of Wells, Rich, Greene.

According to the 1989 "Myers Report" on cable advertising, agency media buyers are more attuned than ever to the importance of upfront cable, with 68% saying they believe it will have a "significant impact" on the broadcast media within the next year.

Already, however, some agency executives are sounding warnings of an advertiser backlash if cable networks try to raise CPMs too far, too fast.

"Granted, there's a lot of demand, but if cable networks continue to raise rates because of higher demand instead of higher [audience] ratings, something is going to have to give," says Chuck Bachrach, exec VP-director of network programming, Western International Media.

"Probably in the second half of the year advertisers are going to start saying 'enough is enough.' The ratings simply don't justify the continued rate increases," he says.

Although agency executives agree cable is now a well-established part of clients' media mixes, they also argue the industry needs better research and administrative systems for processing and tracking commercial orders than are available.

The Cabletelevision Advertising Bureau has made cable's administrative problems its No. 1 priority and will press in 1990 for industrywide standards on items such as commercial contracts, says Robert Alter, CAB president. □

Auto, retail, package goods and fast-food also are contributing to an expected 20% increase in ad revenues at the Discovery Channel, according to Kathy Clinton, senior VP-advertising sales.

With cable penetration now at the 56.4% level, which translates into 50.9 million cable TV homes, cable networks and operators will have to work harder than ever to improve customer service, says Whitney Goit, senior VP-marketing & sales, Arts & Entertainment.

On-air promotions also will get an overhaul at several networks such as VH-1, which has hired a group of writers and producers. "We will have a much stronger presence in 1990, in terms of the numbers of [on-air] spots and their look and feel," says Edward Bennett, VH-1 president.

Meanwhile, more trade advertising and promotion is planned by several networks such as A&E, whose niche now has been invaded by several competitors. "There's more noise out there than ever before, and we've got to keep pace so we're top of mind with advertisers," Mr. Goit says.

Several cable networks plan to provide better research to agencies and their clients so cable can be more easily weighed against traditional broadcast alternatives.

"The buzzwords for 1990 for ad-supported cable are going to be reach, frequency, demographic skews and efficiencies," says Dick Hammer, VP-advertising sales, The Family Channel. "Now that agencies have accepted cable as a regular part of the media mix, they'll look to more traditional media criteria to judge its value."

The newest twist in value-added marketing partnerships allows agencies to work with portions of their clients' budgets the agencies never dealt with before.

For example, many leading magazines are beginning to spend more on consumer promotions, shifting the money away from trade efforts.

But here again, agencies expect publishers to accept such partnerships as one more element of the buying process, not some miracle replacement for rate negotiation.

Some media buyers are predicting that magazines could be the hot medium for advertisers in the coming decade, but they say publishers have a few things to prove first.

The media buyers are demanding more in-depth research on a magazine's reach, its relationships to the reader, its ad effectiveness.

"Magazines have survived the threat of TV, but is it because they're doing something right or because TV is having problems?" said Edward Wax, president-ceo, Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising.

Buyers also are pushing publishers into a Catch 22 situation by asking them to improve editorial quality while insisting on creative ad deals that usually involve a discounted rate that drives magazine revenues down.

Publishers insist rate negotiation eventually weakens their editorial product.

So far, buyers have been able to push for and obtain discounts because competition between magazines is heating up and the proliferation of niche magazines is pulling more and more ad dollars out of the marketplace.

That means publishers are doing what they have to do in order to stay afloat.

"The print marketplace is changing dramatically," says Ms. Smith.

"In 1970, there were 1,200 consumer magazines. Now, there are over 2,400," she continues. "The traditional means of doing business by the good old rate card is going by the wayside." □ tiate, are passing on the burden to the reader, raising cover and subscription prices.

In their ad pages, they expect to see strong growth in 1990 from automobiles, tobacco, liquor and computers, all basically no-growth categories in the early to mid-1980s.

To attract a broader advertising base, many magazines are expanding their editorial products and publishing more themed ad sections.

As niche publications grow in popularity, magazines also are making more of an attempt to sell individual sections to their advertisers.

In a new twist, Meredith's Ladies' Home Journal is asking advertisers not to compare it to the "Seven Sisters," but rather to judge its individual sections, such as health and fashion, against niche magazines that focus on the same topics.

"Our sections are as strong as any magazine in their field," claims Myrna Blyth, the magazine's editor in chief and publishing director.

neurial spirit still will be very much alive, small publishers will need the support of major media companies to survive in the emerging global market.

Cover up...Playboy and Penthouse may suffer; their sleazier sisters definitely will. Can't ignore the continuing impact of AIDS and the country's return to basic values.

Not paying a premium...Hot-air circulation will diminish. More magazines will follow Time's lead in cutting back on the use of premiums to drive up subscriber counts and letting their rate bases fall where they may. The premiums failed to deliver loyal readers and merely begat more expensive gadgetry while milking the bottom line.

Does not compute...Computer books went through a shakeout recently but there's still too many around —way too many, say media buyers. More will down-load next year.

Blinded by science...The experiment's over: Most science magazines—the fad of the early '80s—have seen steadily declining circulation numbers. Many of the players in the '80s already no longer exist. □ works already is 30% to 35% committed—as more advertisers have entered the medium, many fearing they may be squeezed out of scatter positions later in the year if automakers make another run at available inventory. Yet last-minute needs will remain the overriding factor, says Mr. Kaline.

Scatter buying has revived network radio advertising, flat between 1987 and 1988. Depending on the monitoring service, growth was up either 4.7% or 12.1% in the first three quarters. The lower figure, an estimate based on units times rates, comes from Arbitron's Broadcast Advertisers Reports. The latter is from Radio Network Assn., and is based on ad receipts from 22 networks.

"Everyone wants value-added, and the fact that radio has begun to respond to that in areas beyond the youth side is important," says Mr. Kaline.

Adding value is an integral part of Anheuser-Busch Cos. radio buys. "Locally, we've been working successfully with a lot of tie-ins to consumer promotion, particularly in sports," says Chuck Fruit, VP-corporate media & sports marketing for A-B. "Nationally, we're involved with everything from straight network to syndicated program sponsorship."

A-B plans to keep using radio as part of a media package, as it has done this year in sponsoring the Rolling Stones tour, which also included signage and TV and cable buys.

A-B spent $42.7 million in 1988 on radio, down 2.1% from 1987, but has maintained 1988 levels through 1989 and expects to do the same in 1990. Radio pulls 10% to 15% of the company's total media budget, with 25% of radio dollars headed to network buys.

Richard Vietra, media supervisor for Backer Spielvogel Bates, New York, which handles Campbell Soup's red & white label soups, says radio's strengths are cost efficiency and lack of clutter.

"Companies are more and more interested in the bottom line than ever before. There are more products, things are tight on Wall Street, brand loyalty is a thing of the past," he says.

Tie-ins

ents are buying radio as a backup to a TV image campaign, says Lawrence Norjean, senior VP, marketing and sales for the Radio Advertising Bureau.

Peter Moore, president of the Radio Network Association, predicts at least a 10% across-the-board increase in 1990.

Mr. Youlious says, "1987 was the nightmare, '88 was the turnaround year, '89 has been very good, and in 1990 we feel we'll be at least 6% to 8% over 1989."

Substantiating that claim is the heavy upfront buying for 1990. At ABC some 60% of available time was bought upfront, compared with the 30% to 50% upfront markets of the past.

mat has settled into a comfortable routine. But a mid-life crisis may be looming as 40-decibel commercials clash with the mellow sounds emanating from your headset. Still primarily a one-station-a-market wonder.

Birds do it, bees do it... Even radio stations do it. An AM without an FM or an FM with no AM is a lonely drone. Better ratings, higher sales come with togetherness. One is the loneliest number.

Oh, shut up... The glut of moronic exchanges in advertising on the airwaves could make one lose faith in one's fellow man. Listening to insipid chat on the radio is cause for a swift channel switch.

Jessica Hahn's legacy... The giggling female radio presence—perhaps best typified by a Phoenix station's hiring of Ms. Hahn following her, ahem, brush with fame—is difficult for even the most dedicated chauvinist to swallow. So what if the job pays well?

Who's kidding whom?... Kiddie radio was a good idea gone awry. After the initial hoopla surrounding KPAL-AM's move to children's programming, advertising floundered and the Little Rock, Ark., station since has shoe-horned kid's programming into 2½ hours a day, down from 14 hours. □

Outdoor: The buyers' perspective

Room to pick and choose

By Alison Fahey

There are truths, half-truths and then research. Despite concern about the reliability of data on out-of-home's frequency and reach, advertisers plan to spend up to 6% more in the medium in 1990 than they did this year.

Developments in 1989 will continue in 1990, according to agency execs. That means new category growth, moderate rate hikes, off-rate-card dealing and declining spending in liquor and tobacco, the health of the latter tied to how RJR carves up its media plans for 1990 which already includes a 25% cut in magazines.

Declining tobacco spending will keep inventory available and rate increases low, marketers say. There are "wide-open avails in the first quarter," says Pete Riordan, VP, BBDO Worldwide, referring to a drop already in upfront buys from tobacco companies.

Rates, however, ultimately could be affected by an expected increase in 1990 by Patrick Media Group. The large outdoor company has not raised rates in 18 months while trying to sell operations in many of its markets to pay off debt.

"I expect Patrick will have to play catch-up ball at some point next year," says Mr. Riordan.

"Everybody is waiting to see what happens to Patrick's branches," says Robert Flood, senior VP-director of corporate outdoor, D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles, St. Louis.

As in other media, adding value via creative ad packages has found its way into outdoor.

"We are anxious to negotiate with packages. We like the idea of getting a proposal that combines various [out-of-home] formats," says Mr. Riordan, referring to Gannett Transit's packages that may include outdoor boards, subways and bus shelters.

Also, in-store media is heating up as new players enter the market at a breakneck pace. Many have been enticed by ad packages combining outdoor with in-store.

Improving research in general is a simmering issue in the industry. "They need new and improved research on delivery," says Glenn Griffin, outdoor media specialist, Young & Rubicam, New York.

An industry-backed attempt to revamp the audience measurement system, scheduled to be completed by 1991, is expected to address advertisers' concerns that current reach and frequency numbers are inflated.

Some advertisers are keeping their outdoor spending down until the new data is available, agency execs say.

The Jan. 1 planned merger of the Traffic Audit Bureau and the Out-of-Home Measurement Bureau is expected to result in more reliable numbers on more out-of-home media formats.

The new organization, Traffic Audit Bureau for Media Measurement, will broaden its base to include in-store media and bus shelters.

Many outdoor companies have been successful in attracting new users by touting the medium's ability to target, and backing up this claim with hard evidence from systems like Conquest and Prizm.

These efforts "are definitely working," says Mr. Griffin, noting Y&R clients in package goods, healthcare and retail are considering outdoor for the first time. □

She sees a possibility to close the gap between national and local rates, particularly as national newspapers put more pressure on local papers. Ms. Ritchie applauds The National, the nationally distributed sports newspaper that will be launched next year, for its single rate for both national and local advertisers. Currently, the disparity between national and local rates can range from 15% to 100%.

"Newspapers for many years had a blind spot as far as national advertisers were concerned," she says, referring to an almost blase attitude toward national advertising because it represented a minor part of total linage. In '88, national placements represented just over 11% of all newspaper ads.

"The world of newspapers is 4,000 separate kingdoms," Ms. Ritchie says, noting that she is beginning to see more flexibility in some of those kingdoms.

Yet, in today's market, most buyers say no one buys at the national rate.

Newspapers' merchandising and cross-promotional activities have been almost nonexistent. "The [advertising] sale of newspapers has not been as sophisticated as other media, and that may be part of their problem," says Ms. Ritchie.

"Newspapers can be as creative as any other medium," says Mr. Mitchell. "You just have to push it."

But overall, the buyers are not optimistic about the medium's future.

Newspaper's outlook "is grim. The trend has been that newspapers are getting a bit weaker each year. I don't know how they will pull themselves up," says Mr. Jacoby, pointing to the industry's heel-dragging on more flexible national rates and its inability to grab young readers.

"The long-term trends are very ominous," says Ms. Ritchie. "Unless newspapers rise to the occasion, they're going to find themselves out of business." □ years. The News & Observer is hoping to increase classified linage by establishing "pick-up" classified rates that give Sunday classified buyers a half-price rate for Monday.

These strategies help take the pressure off straight rate-card negotiations. "We're very careful not to go off the rate card," Mr. Crisp says.

But the reality of newspaper selling these days demands flexibility.

The News & Observer may change the rate card to "test a supplemental rate card during the year," he says. "Ten years ago no one would have dreamed of that."

Outdoor Group.

"We have to keep up with marketers' changing product strategies and continue to show them how we can add value to their local media plans," says Tom Hudson, Patrick Media Group's VP-national marketing and sales and general manager of the Los Angeles office. This means putting outdoor on the must-buy media list to target minority groups, for example.

Rather than selling out-of-home strictly as a cost-efficient way to target locally, industry players are detailing how outdoor can serve as an effective companion medium—even among other out-of-home forms. Gannett Outdoor Group, which has a variety of outdoor vehicles at its command, reports it has sold about 20 ad packages that typically include bus, subway and outdoor boards.

With an influx of in-store media—everything from the old standby shelf-talker to the newest electronic video network—ad packages combining outdoor with in-store media also are surfacing. Outdoor sellers see this as their way to tap into marketers' desire to bring sales messages increasingly closer to the point of sale.

With the growing support of retailers and other new clients, more in-depth research on reach and frequency, out-of-home audience demographics and new ad packages continually emerging, the industry seems to be recovering from the trauma of three years ago. □

OCTOBER AD RESULTS

Newsweeklies show gains

October was a solid month for ad-page gains among the three national newsweeklies.

Men's magazines also turned in good performances, according to Publishers Information Bureau data, as did Life, which saw its October ad-page count double from 1988 levels. Forbes regained the year-to-date ad volume lead from Fortune.

After a disappointing summer, Newsweek turned in a strong performance, bringing its ad-page count even with last year's January-October period.

The newsweekly carried 337 October ad pages, 19.7% higher than October 1988. Its 10-month 1989 ad-page total was 1,957, a modest 0.1% advance (see table at right). Executives at the magazine last week insisted they weren't worried about falling ad-page volume; they noted PIB ad revenues were up 5.4% over 1988 to more than $200 million for the first 10 months of 1989.

Publisher Howard Smith said Newsweek's fourth quarter is looking strong and that he expects 1989 results will surpass 1988 in both ad-page volume and revenues.

Newsweek's October performance brought it no closer to category-leading Time, whose October ad-page volume was up 24.3% from 1988 to 359 pages. For the January-October period, Time's ad count was 2,210 pages, up 11.6% from last year.

Time continued to benefit from Max-Plan, Time Inc. Magazine Co.'s corporate discount program.

U.S. News & World Report also had a healthy October, logging 272 ad pages, a 37% increase over the year-ago period. Its January-October count rose 9.7% to 1,604 pages.

Among business magazines, Forbes recaptured the 1989 ad volume lead from Fortune after surrendering it in September. Forbes benefited from publishing three regular issues in October and also its annual Forbes 400 edition. Fortune published two issues in October.

Forbes' October ad-page total of 793 was up 36.2% over last year. Fortune's October issues carried 486 ad pages, a 7.3% hike. For the year to date, Forbes carried 3,165 ad pages, up 14.9%, to Fortune's 3,043, up 17.2%.

Business Week's ad-page total for 1989's first 10 months reached 3,927, a 7.1% increase, PIB reported.

After a strong September, TV Guide's ad pages dropped to 246 in October, a 44.4% fall from October 1988. The comparison is affected by the 1988 network TV writers' strike, which delayed the start of the fall 1988 TV season and forced TV Guide's ad-heavy fall TV preview issue into October from September.

After a first-half dip in ad volume from 1988 levels, TV Guide had rebounded during the summer months and was up 2.4% through September. With October results factored in, TV Guide's ad-page count for January to October was 2,659, 5% below its 1988 pace.

Time Magazines' Life, which is having its best year ever as a monthly, carried 136 ad pages in October, a 109.7% increase over last year. Its January-October count reached 676 ad pages, a 24.5% jump.

Hearst Magazines' Victoria, meanwhile, more than doubled its ad-page count for the first 10 months. The magazine carried 136 ad pages, a 151.8% leap.

Travel & Leisure continued to dominate the travel field, despite increased competition in the category. Its ad pages totaled 1,206 for the first 10 months, up 10.1% over last year. Conde Nast Traveler carried 754 ad pages for the same period, a 50.7% increase.

Endless Vacation saw its ad page count rise 9.7% to 299, while Travel/Holiday's pages climbed 9.1% to 369. National Geographic Traveler posted a 34.2% increase to 149 ad pages.

Among health titles, Owen Lipstein's American Health, which is reportedly about to be sold to Reader's Digest Association, carried 616 ad pages through October, a 12.2% increase.

Its competitors didn't fare as well. Health saw its ad pages fall 17% to 336, while Prevention's pages dipped 9.5% to 510.

Men's magazines looked strong, overall, through 1989's first 10 months. GQ's ad pages rose 5% to 1,820, while Esquire's pages rose 14.8% to 1,049. Playboy's pages reached 596, a 10.2% jump, while Penthouse reported its pages rose 19.1% to 511. □

Bertelsmann tops in Euro media

By David Murrow

LONDON—Bertelsmann is No. 1 in European media revenues, according to a recent Saatchi & Saatchi Communications report.

This is the first time Saatchi has conducted the study, called "Top 50 European Media Owners" and based on the most recent year's financial reports on media revenues from TV, print, radio, cinema and outdoor from 17 European countries.

The top 50 corporations generated media revenues of more than $31 billion during that time.

Bertelsmann, a West German media conglomerate, led the list with $1.67 billion in media revenues out of total company revenues of $6.45 billion.

Reed International, the U.K.'s largest publisher, ranked second with $1.65 billion in media revenues. Silvio Berlusconi's Fininvest placed third, claiming media revenues of $1.47 billion.

No single media owner accounts for more than 4% of European advertising revenue, estimated at $50 billion, the report found.

Media "companies are increasingly becoming multimedia and multinational," said Steven Winram, Saatchi's worldwide media research and information director.

"We know all about the centralization of media buying, so we decided to . . . study the recipients of the money being spent," he said.

Of the top 50, U.K. companies have the most representation, with 16 companies accounting for 30% of total media revenue.

German media companies, with 10 in the top 50, representing 23% of the total, are second.

"The principal criterion . . . is those media revenues and media properties that are of direct interest to the advertisers, advertising agents and media buyers who use these vehicles as part of their consumer marketing effort," the report said.

Rounding out the top 10 European media owners were: Germany's Axel Springer Verlag, the largest newspaper publisher in Europe; French magazine group Hachette; French communications giant Havas; U.K. newspaper and magazine publisher United Newspapers; French media group Hersant; German publisher Heinrich Bauer Verlag; and Rizzoli-Corriere della Sera, the Italian publisher.

"Top 50 European Media Owners" costs about $440 and is available from Saatchi & Saatchi Communications, 80 Charlotte St., London W1A 1AQ, England. □

Murdoch allays media merger fear

By Wayne Walley

NEW YORK—The development of a global TV network will likely be spawned by advertisers, not the media, Rupert Murdoch says.

"One network under one ownership umbrella would be very tidy, but it's not possible in all countries," the News Corp. chief executive said this month at Yeshiva University's Benjamin N. Cardozo School of Law. "When you do get a global network, it will be for sporting events, and it will be driven by advertisers."

But Mr. Murdoch said his company would like to create some form of a global news service with the "ability to plug in anywhere in the world for your news. We are reaching out. I know NBC is reaching out, too, to form these sorts of associations [or partnerships] around the world."

During his 75-minute conversation with attorney Howard Squadron about the development of global communications companies, Mr. Murdoch hinted at some changes at TV Guide and questioned regulatory constraints on media, media consolidation, the "success" of USA Today and the future of daily newspapers.

"TV Guide has a long way to go," Mr. Murdoch said of the weekly he bought in August 1988. "Half of American homes have cable TV. Within five years, all cable will have 55 channels. It's going to be major work deciding what you are going to watch every night. You will want a good, complete guide, much better than a newspaper can afford to give you."

As for government regulations, he said, "the trouble is that it takes years [for legislators] to work it out and it quickly becomes outdated." Instead, he'd like to "allow market forces to work."

Mr. Murdoch said he sees technology as the likely equalizer for any potential dangers from media mergers. "I don't think there's going to be a monopoly," he said. "It's too easy to start a magazine today. Technology offers more, cheaper opportunities for diversity."

Regarding USA Today, Mr. Murdoch said Gannett Co. has "done a magnificent job in production, and marketing it and selling it to advertisers, but it doesn't satisfy readers. I think it's disappointing."

USA Today's competition, however, isn't coming from daily newspapers, he said.

"There is less readership of daily newspapers today because of so much TV news and radio news," Mr. Murdoch said. ". . . I'm not saying newspapers are going to die, far from it. But I think daily newspapers of large circulations are going to find it hard. There are other ways [to reach consumers]. The media are changing." □

Big campaigns draw mixed recall

By Scott Hume

Maybe there aren't any rules when it comes to new ad campaigns.

The October adWatch survey of ad awareness presents a mixed bag of results for three high-profile campaigns in three different product categories.

Burger King Corp.'s $150 million "Sometimes you just gotta break the rules" campaign didn't elicit much of a response from the 1,000 consumers polled last month.

For Nissan Motor Corp. USA's $60 million-plus effort for its new Infiniti division, the news was mixed. After a slow start, the controversial ads that didn't show the product until Nov. 5 generated more recall than they had immediately after their launch. But as far as top-of-mind awareness, Infiniti is still back in the pack of automotive advertisers from which it has tried to differentiate itself.

The strongest showing was posted by Apple Computer, which introduced its first laptop computer at the start of the month and broke a $40 million campaign for the Macintosh line midmonth.

D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles and Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising, both New York, handle Burger King; Hill, Holliday, Connors, Cosmopulos, Marina del Rey, Calif., handles Infiniti; BBDO Worldwide, Los Angeles, is Apple's agency.

None of the three cracked the list of 10 best-recalled advertisers for October. What stands out most on that list is the appearance of two "generic" entries. Auto ads in general tied for sixth; grocery store ads in general came in tenth.

This raises the unsettling question of whether consumers are exposed to so much advertising that they're remembering categories rather than brands.

Before advertisers lose too much sleep over that, however, they should consider what happened to the Burger King, Infiniti and Apple brands.

Burger King executives from the start have said their "break the rules" campaign is a long-term effort meant to create a dialogue with consumers rather than indulge in the short-term, promotional ads tied to new products and price discounts favored by so many other chains.

In that case, the October survey results won't surprise them.

When respondents were asked which fast-food advertising first came to mind, 46.1% named McDonald's Corp. (up 2.5 points from September); 12.6% named Wendy's International (up 4.2 points); and 11.4% named Burger King (up 0.8 points).

McDonald's spent the month promoting various discounts and the new McRib sandwich; Wendy's introduced a Super Value Menu of 99¢ food products; and Burger King launched its string of low-key image spots, with minor weight given to a new BK Doubles sandwich line.

Nissan's Infiniti garnered only one unaided mention in September but boosted that to eight in October, good enough to tie it (with K mart Corp. and Nike) for 13th overall.

But when respondents were asked which car or truck ad first came to mind, Infiniti ranked 17th.

Maybe people didn't understand from the ads that Infiniti is an automobile.

Ford topped the category again with 20% of first mentions, Chevrolet was No. 2 with 18.9% Toyota was No. 3 with 6.7%.

Apple showed the biggest gain of any advertiser for the month. When respondents were asked which computer advertising first came to mind, Apple received 33.1% of first mentions, up 5.5 points from its September showing.

IBM Corp. was No. 2 with 18% (vs. 18.7% the previous month); Radio Shack was No. 3 with 3.7% (vs. 4.4%).

AdWatch is a joint project of Advertising Age and the Gallup Organization. Awareness is measured by asking a nationally projectable sample of adults to name the first advertiser that comes to mind, overall and in several categories, from all heard, seen or read in the previous 30 days. The phone survey's margin of error is plus or minus 3.1%.

Among other items of note, Coca-Cola remained the best-recalled advertising overall last month. But it still can't catch Pepsi-Cola when respondents are asked to recall the first soft-drink ad they remember.

Pepsi-Cola came to mind first for 36.6%, up from 35.3% in September. Coca-Cola was No. 2 with 29.9% of first mentions, down 4 points from the previous month. Diet Coke was No. 3 with a 6.4% share (vs. 6.5%). □

Jamaica starts agency review

By Jon Lafayette

NEW YORK—While the federal bribery case against Young & Rubicam slowly works its way to trial, the Jamaica Tourist Board has begun the process of selecting another agency.

Last week, the tourist board began contacting by fax a short list of agencies to pitch its $5 million-to-$10 million account, said Regional Manager Noel Mignott.

Among the agencies contacted were Bozell; Chiat/Day/Mojo; FCB/Leber Katz Partners; Jordan, McGrath, Case & Taylor; Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising; and Tromson Monroe, all New York, and Burrell Advertising, Chicago.

Mr. Mignott declined to give out the full list until he could determine which agencies are interested in pursuing the account.

Some of those contacted won't be interested. Saatchi & Saatchi currently is agency for the Mexican National Tourist Council. The account is under review, however, and Bozell is a contender.

The eventual agency there is unlikely to be able to pursue the Jamaican account.

Chiat dropped out of Jamaica's earlier review in April and has since indicated it's no longer interested.

Meanwhile, Y&R's trial on conspiracy and racketeering charges in connection with its handling of the Jamaica Tourist Board account isn't expected to start until February, sources said.

When the trial does begin, the two Jamaicans charged with accepting bribe money, businessman Arnold Foote Jr. and former Tourism Minister Eric Anthony Abrahams, are unlikely to be in the courtroom.

"There's definitely a large question whether these offenses are extraditable under the treaty," said an official in the U.S. attorney's office.

The U.S. government, however, doesn't believe the unavailability of the two Jamaicans will affect the charges against Y&R.

"There are a lot of offenses that are not extraditable," the official said. "It doesn't mean they weren't properly charged or that other people can't be proceeded against."

A Y&R source said the agency would prefer to have the two Jamaicans available as witnesses. But since the Jamaicans are defendants, they might choose not to testify.

Earlier this month, Y&R made motions to dismiss the charges. The government has until Dec. 1 to respond. □ time commercial and CPMs up 7% can be expected.

Coen forecasts

Because of the red-hot upfront market for the 1989-90 TV season, prices will be much higher in the opening quarter with prime-time commercials up 10% and CPMs about 12% from first quarter 1989.

But with the economy expected to worsen as the year evolves, prices will drop. Prime-time costs will soften as some marketers will exercise cancellation options.

Next year also will see more reruns than 1989, which feasted on more first runs because of the fall 1988 writers' strike.

■ Spot TV. Overall spot TV increases for most markets are expected to rise 4% in unit prices and CPMs. However, there could be wide swings by market and time of the year.

Demand for spot TV commercial time has been soft since early 1985 and will remain so in 1990. Two big factors shaping the spot market—economic conditions and new-product launches—won't show much improvement.

The most important package-goods advertisers have been tightening their budgets. Only categories such as automobile dealer associations and travel and resorts may have somewhat larger budgets.

Non-network commercial inventory will be tight in September and October, reflecting heavy spending on political campaigns.

The buyers of spot TV schedules will be able to negotiate favorable prices if there's enough lead time and a deep enough market list. Schedules placed at the last minute in weeks or months of above-average activity may be subject to exceptionally high prices as stations make up for under-budget performances.

■ Cable TV. Unit prices and CPMs for cable will increase 12% and 8%, respectively, in outdistancing growth of other media.

Cable's pricing growth is a function of larger audiences, greater coverage by the cable networks and improved ratings.

Cable CPMs remain a bargain despite the unit-rate escalation.

■ Network radio. Unit rates and CPMs for network radio will both rise 4% in holding to inflation.

This comes after a year of heavy rate increases largely responding to the relatively limited supply of radio network commercial slots.

Network radio will maintain its appeal to advertisers, but key users could modify their strategies and thereby soften total buying pressure.

■ Spot radio. Spot radio increases should reach 5% for unit prices and 4% for CPMs following a year of stronger increases.

Like network radio, it's difficult for this medium to post large price gains in successive years.

■ Newspapers. Newspaper ad increases will be more in line with other media in 1990 as unit prices and CPMs improve 5%.

National ad rates of newspapers historically rise in line with newsprint and labor costs. During most of the '80s, newspaper rate increases have been larger than increases in general inflation.

Buyer demand gradually has weakened. Newspapers' more earthbound projections reflect a need by the medium to become more competitive for ad dollars.

■ Magazines. Magazine publishers now feel justified to ask for large price increases. For the past three years, magazines have been under intense pressure to modify rates and provide many extras. This pressure has left ad rate increases lagging behind the rise in their own costs.

Unit prices should grow by 6% and CPMs by 5%, though intense competition between magazines in a year of sluggish ad growth will affect the final size of the real rate increases.

■ Outdoor. The demand and pricing in this medium should turn up in 1990—5% in unit prices and 4% in CPMs—after bottoming out this year.

The industry has been feeling the ad decline in several important categories—and has had to moderate rate increases while providing more special concessions and extra bonus exposures.

■ Direct mail. Unit and CPM increases will rise only 3% as direct mailers continue to reel under pressures of higher postal rates. Rates in first quarter 1989 were 10% to 15% higher than a year earlier, contributing to a fall-off in mail piece volume.

Another postal rate increase is possible late in 1990, cutting deeper into volume. But for most of the year, advertising mailing costs will be barely higher than in 1989. □

Mr. Coen is senior VP-director of forecasting at McCann-Erickson Worldwide, New York. His projections of media costs are the most widely anticipated forecasts in the industry and are presented exclusively in Advertising Age.

The Energizer bunny makes its next commercial appearance when it "chow chow chows" across a Purina cat food spot.

Energizer bunny will plug Purina

By Julie Liesse Erickson

Ralston Purina Co. is hopping on its own Energizer bunny bandwagon.

When Ralston's Eveready Battery Co. breaks its new Energizer TV commercials Dec. 11, the mechanical pink bunny will start marching through spots for real Ralston products.

In the first to air, the bunny interrupts Purina Cat Chow's well-known "Chow chow chow" campaign.

The "Chow chow chow" campaign hasn't run since 1985, and Energizer agency Chiat/Day/Mojo shot its own version of that old concept.

In the new spot, the bunny walks onto the set, dancing along with the woman and her cat to the "Chow chow chow" step before parading across a line of Cat Chow boxes.

The 15-second spot is one of four new commercials that begin airing this week. This second wave, primarily :15s, parodies familiar commercial genres: bath soap, snack food and direct-mail record albums.

The spot for "Alarm!" bath soap shows a man showering. As a chorus sings, "Alarm! It'll start your day. . . . Alarm! You'll be on your way. . . . Ring in your day with Alarm!" the man glances down to find the bunny—in yellow rain slicker and hat—marching through the shower.

Another spot is intended to create the flavor of late-night spots promoting greatest-hits record collections; it seemingly offers viewers a collection of "The Best of Olga Montiera," a fictional harpist.

The last parody is for "Pigskins" snack chips; the spot stars former National Football League player Lyle Alzado—a real-life former TV spokesman for Block

An Advertising Age roundup

A new joint cereal venture between General Mills and Nestle SA may be a prototype for companies hurrying to enter Europe before 1992.

The venture arrangement also represents an attractive alternative to debt-laden acquisitions or inadequate licensing agreements for marketers.

The agreement between Nestle and General Mills, announced last week, calls for the creation of a separate company, Cereal Partners Worldwide, to market ready-to-eat cereals in all areas outside the U.S. and Canada.

Cereal Partners will be owned equally by the two companies, which will split responsibility for capital investments.

Vevey, Switzerland-based Nestle, headed by Managing Director Helmut Maucher, and Minneapolis-based General Mills, whose chairman-ceo is Bruce Atwater, each will control half the seats on the board.

Robert Trumbull, senior consultant at Clarion Marketing & Communications, Greenwich, Conn., said joint ventures are the "wave of the future," particularly in the U.S., Japan and Europe—"major markets where distribution presents such an enormous barrier to gaining entry."

Mr. Trumbull said food companies in particular could initiate more joint ventures overseas, because food-store distribution is "the toughest nut to crack."

Helmut Maucher

Bertrand Facon, an analyst with Credit Suisse First Boston, London, said, "This signals that U.S. companies, after talking about 1992 for so long, are realizing they are very weak in Europe. I think [General Mills] realized they are not going to expand without help."

John Quelch, marketing professor at Harvard University's school of business, said such "strategic alliances" as the General Mills/Nestle venture are a sound method for U.S. marketers to gain "access to European distribution channels."

One industry source suggested likely European candidates to enter joint ven-

Burger King courts health fans, kids

Chicken sandwich, new club planned

By Scott Hume

To counter the fast-food industry's reliance on fried foods and appease consumers' interest in healthful foods, Burger King Corp. is preparing to roll out a chicken sandwich it will cook on the flame broilers it uses for hamburgers.

Linking the new sandwich to the hottest craze in food marketing, Burger King will serve the BK Broiler on an oat bran bun.

At the same time, Burger King will battle the fast-food industry's longstanding belief that no one can loosen McDonald's Corp.'s hold on the children's market.

Burger King will fight for brand loyalty among the youngest consumers by launching a Burger King Kids Club, an ambitiously broad children's marketing program set to start next month.

Because preparation of the BK Broiler requires some equipment modifications, the product may not be in all Burger King restaurants until March. But national advertising for the product is planned to begin Feb. 26.

Burger King has tested the sandwich in San Diego and Greensboro, N.C.

Advertising—from new-products agency Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising and black consumer agency UniWorld Group, both New York—has positioned the BK Broiler as an alternative to fried chicken and competitors' chicken sandwiches.

Ads carry the "Sometimes you just gotta break the rules" theme.

The BK Broiler provides Burger King with a competitive answer to rival McDonald's McChicken sandwich, introduced nationally this spring.

The BK Broiler is a formed chicken patty,

Pepsi gets Savage

SOMERS, N.Y.—Pepsi-Cola Co. has filmed a holiday-themed TV spot with Fred Savage, star of ABC's "Wonder Years," an industry source said. Also, Pepsi is said to be close to signing comedian Billy Crystal, who appeared in a spot for Pepsi in the mid-1980s. The company declined comment. BBDO Worldwide, New York, handles Pepsi.

Separately, Pepsi-Cola International is consolidating its worldwide advertising at BBDO, meaning a loss for Leo Burnett Co., Chicago. Burnett lost to BBDO the estimated $25 million-to-$30 million international ad account for the 7UP brand. Also, sources said Pepsi's Canadian 7UP business is likely to move to J. Walter Thompson Co. from Burnett, both Toronto. JWT already handles Pepsi in that country. And in Mexico, Pepsi will move all its soft-drink business, estimated at $6 million, to BBDO from Burnett, both Mexico City, sources said. Pepsi officials said they're in the process of finalizing agency assignments in Canada and Mexico. The company said the consolidation is a financial decision, not a reflection on Burnett's creative work. Burnett continues to handle 7UP in the U.S., where it's owned by Dr Pepper/Seven-Up Cos.

HHCC will operate N.Y. office without president

By Gary Levin

NEW YORK—Walter O'Brien is out as president of Hill, Holliday, Connors, Cosmopulos' office here, and the Boston-based agency will try to get by without a successor.

The agency said it mutually agreed last week to part company with Mr. O'Brien, the fourth person to head the office in less than six years.

Susan Smith, 36, exec VP-new business, and Dennis Farrington, senior VP-group account director, will take on Mr. O'Brien's duties. Neither will be given the task of running the office.

Jack Connors, Hill Holliday president-ceo, earlier hinted changes were coming (AA, Sept. 11).

Asked about his commitment now to the office here, Mr. Connors said, "I'm more committed to it than I've ever been. We probably went through a period when we made 10 new-business pitches and lost 10. Now we're getting on the short lists and winning accounts."

He said he'd consider, but isn't actively seeking, an acquisition to bolster the office.

In recent months, Mr. Connors has spent much of his time here and has been directly involved in pitching accounts.

W. O'Brien

"I think we have a really good team of people here," Ms. Smith said, "and the emphasis we have is on keeping existing clients and building new business. I don't know that a $30 million agency needs a president. We'll get some new business and see where we go, but there's no need to replace" Mr. O'Brien.

Mr. O'Brien's background—running large multinational accounts for J. Walter Thompson Co.—didn't mesh well with Hill Holliday's focus on smaller, entrepreneurial accounts, sources said.

The clash of styles hurt Hill Holliday's attempts to win accounts, though it did pick up SportsChannel America, a $2 million account, last month.

"I think his talent is in the area of working with the largest accounts," Mr. Connors said of Mr. O'Brien. "Obviously, we're a little different than that."

Currently, the office's largest piece of business is the $6 million-to-$8 million United Jersey Banks account.

It also handles Springmaid Sheets, Irish Tourist Board and Pitney Bowes, and does creative work for Labatt Brewing Co.'s Rolling Rock beer.

Last week, the agency lost the Irish Aer Lingus airline account, which spent less than $1 million, to Campbell-Mithun-Esty.

Mr. O'Brien, a 24-year veteran of JWT, joined Hill Holliday only 15 months ago (AA, Aug. 1, 1988), and followed Malcolm MacDougall, Charles Decker and Christine Miller in the top post.

Mr. O'Brien couldn't be reached for comment, but observers expect him to seek work at a larger agency. □

Bayer gets tough with Urich

By Patricia Winters

Robert Urich is taking on Angela Lansbury, but the competition isn't in network TV shows.

Mr. Urich, the former star of "Spenser: For Hire," is the new pitchman for Sterling Drug in a TV campaign positioning Bayer aspirin as the macho medicine for headache relief.

Bristol-Myers Squibb recently broke a campaign featuring Ms. Lansbury for Bufferin (AA, Oct. 23).

Although both competitors are using celebrity endorsers, they part company when it comes to strategy.

Mr. Urich calls Bayer an "adult-size" pain reliever, while Ms. Lansbury takes "a cup of tea and Bufferin" to eliminate aches and pains in ads targeting the over-50 set.

The new campaign for Bayer, best known for its soft-edged "wonder drug that works wonders" effort, shows Mr. Urich explaining how he beats headaches.

"When I get headaches, they're not little baby ones. They're full-grown, adult-size bangaroos," he says.

In a new Bayer spot, actor Robert Urich "bangs back" a headache with the "adult-size" pain reliever.

The spot closes with the tagline: "For adult-size pain—Bayer, the wonder drug that works wonders."

Lintas:New York handles the $30 million account. The Urich spot will air in 15-, 20- and 30-second versions on network, spot and cable TV.

Industry observers say Bayer's stronger pain relief message is an attempt to revive the aspirin business.

Last year, Bayer and other marketers all but dropped ads promoting aspirin to prevent second heart attacks after the strategy failed to boost the segment.

"The aspirin segment is really taking it on the chin, and Bayer as the leader is also taking it on the chin," said one industry executive who asked not be named.

Aspirin unit volume was down 9% through August from a year earlier, this source said. Ibuprofen-based pain relievers are growing, with tracking data putting unit volume up 21%.

Bayer is the leader of the aspirin segment with about a 17% share; Bufferin is fourth with a 10% share behind American Home Products Corp.'s Anacin and Bristol's Excedrin. □

Chiat wins Reebok overseas

By Pat Sloan

Reebok International has named Chiat/Day/Mojo, London, as lead agency for advertising outside the U.S.

The international division account represented $15 million in billings in 1989 and is expected to go higher in 1990.

Chiat's New York office is Reebok's main agency in the U.S.

The move won't affect Reebok's 38 local agencies in the foreign countries where the company operates through distributors and subsidiaries, said John Duerden, international division managing director based in Bolton-Lancashire, England.

All other Reebok agencies, including Lowe Howard-Spink, London, will remain in place, he said.

Chiat "is working with us on the development of global advertising. We will use them as the lead agency to interface with the others," Mr. Duerden said.

He added that a new international campaign should be ready "in the first half of next year and will be adapted to different countries."

"One of the places we'll spend money in the next five years is in Eastern Europe," said Reebok Chairman Paul Fireman. "We're one of the hottest products in the Soviet Union on the black market. And we're putting products in their stores, too.

"We've also looked at a Polish factory for athletic footwear. And in countries where it's appropriate, like Hungary, we'll advertise."

Mr. Fireman said he's committed to international expansion and the opportunities it offers for increasing both sales and profits.

Reebok had about $1.8 billion in total sales in 1988, but international sales are pegged at just $350 million.

Next year, the international growth rate should exceed 15%, Mr. Duerden said. □

Wary consumers want more health ad info

By Julie Liesse Erickson

Consumers say they want more health messages in food product ads, but they're looking at those messages with a skeptical eye.

Those are the conclusions of a poll of 1,000 consumers conducted for Advertising Age by the Gallup Organization.

More than eight of 10 (82%) consumers polled said they'd like to see more products advertised as having health-related benefits. But 49% said they didn't believe product claims such as "the ability to reduce cholesterol."

Kellogg Co. last week launched a $45 million campaign for Heartwise, with network TV spots promoting the new ready-to-eat cereal as high in soluble fiber and containing psyllium and extolling the health virtues of a high-fiber, low-fat diet (AA, Nov. 27).

Although Kellogg said the campaign is educational, consumers already appear to have learned their lessons about diet and health.

Nearly half of those surveyed (47%) said they'd bought in the previous 30 days a food product marketed as promoting good health. That included 54% of women polled and 40% of men.

Also, 86% of women surveyed said they'd like to see more ads promoting products' health benefits, compared with 77% of men.

But seeing isn't necessarily believing. Asked whether they believe such product health claims as "the ability to reduce cholesterol" (a claim General Mills has made in introductory ads for its high soluble-fiber Benefit cereal), 48% of the total sample said they believe the claims, but 49% said they do not.

That finding may interest state attorneys general, who've criticized—and in some cases filed suit against—some food companies' health claims as confusing or deceptive.

Minnesota Attorney General Hubert H. Humphrey III recently said that "health and nutrition claims in food advertising are almost totally out of control, with little sign of restraint or responsibility from advertisers."

The random nationwide survey was conducted by phone in October. It has a margin of error of plus or minus 3.1%.

Older consumers may present a dilemma for marketers. More than half (53%) of those 55 or older said they'd bought healthful foods, compared with 39% of those ages 18 to 34.

But they're less supportive of seeing more health claims than are younger consumers, and more skeptical. Only 46% of older consumers said they believe health claims, compared with 52% of the 18-to-34-year-olds.

Other groups with comparatively high concentrations of consumers buying healthful foods were the college-educated and consumers in the North Central states.

Cereals continue to lead the way among perceived healthful products. Of those respondents who said they'd bought a product advertised as healthful, 25% said it was an oatmeal or oat bran product. Another 12% had bought other cereal products.

The most often mentioned branded products were General Mills' Cheerios and Quaker Oats Co.'s Quaker Oat Bran and Quaker oatmeal.

Among other "healthy" products purchased included apples, milk and yogurt. □

P&G takes the cake with health strategy

By Laurie Freeman

Procter & Gamble Co. is taking a health-oriented marketing approach for its Duncan Hines cake mixes and frostings.

P&G's strategy contrasts with competitors General Mills and Pillsbury Co., both of which are concentrating on microwaveable and candy-added products.

The shift coincides with P&G's introduction today of a new Duncan Hines Sheetcake ready-to-spread frosting line and the relaunch of two cake mix flavors.

All Duncan Hines mixes and frostings are now flagged with a "no palm oil" label, and cake mix packages include recipes for low-calorie and no-cholesterol baking.

An estimated $3 million ad campaign starts in January via N W Ayer, New York, though the new frostings and the reintroduced orange and banana flavor mixes will be available this month.

Sheetcake frostings contain only 11.3 ounces of frosting mix, compared with the regular 16-ounce packages. The frostings are meant to appeal to consumers baking sheetcakes, cupcakes and brownies, which require less frosting than layer cakes, said Don Tassone, a P&G spokesman.

Duncan Hines leads the $735 million cake mix category with a 32% share, followed by General Mills' 30.6% share for Betty Crocker products and Pillsbury's 22.8%, trade sources said.

General Mills is completing national distribution of two new MicroRave cake mix flavors: Apple Streusel and Cinnamon Pecan.

DDB Needham Worldwide, Chicago, handles the Betty Crocker baking line.

Pillsbury this fall introduced Funfetti cake mix and frosting, both with candy sprinkles.

Print ads are supporting the national launch, and a network and spot TV commercial from Leo Burnett USA, Chicago, will break soon.

P&G has added candy pieces to three of its Duncan Hines frostings, called Polka Dot frostings, but the company isn't planning to add a companion cake mix.

General Mills was first on the market with a candy-added line: the Rainbow Chip variety of Betty Crocker cake mix and frosting. □

Unilever triumphs as top ad spender

P&G, Nestle follow in non-U.S. race

By Julie Skur Hill

Unilever, Procter & Gamble Co. and Nestle held on to their respective slots as the top three advertisers outside the U.S.

In Advertising Age's third ranking of the top 50 leading ad spenders outside the U.S., the Anglo-Dutch conglomerate kept its top ranking, doling out $1.2 billion in 24 countries in 1988.

Cincinnati-based P&G spent $932.7 million in 18 countries outside the U.S., while Vevey, Switzerland-based Nestle chalked up $600.6 million in 19 nations.

Rounding out the top 10 are: Renault, Paris; Matsushita Electric Industrial Co., Osaka, Japan; Fiat, Turin, Italy; Mars Inc., McLean, Va.; Kao Corp., Tokyo; Nissan Motor Co., Tokyo; and Toyota Motor Co., Toyota City, Japan (see chart, Page S-2).

When U.S. ad spending is included, consumer goods giant P&G comes out on top with worldwide spending of $2.4 billion.

New York-based Philip Morris Cos. follows closely in worldwide spending, with $2.4 billion. Philip Morris ranks No. 12 among spenders outside the U.S.

Unilever ranks third worldwide, spending $1.8 billion, while General Motors Corp., Detroit, ranks fourth, spending $1.6 billion.

Spending for the top 50 totalled $12.4 billion, up 37.1% from 1987 figures.

Newcomers to the top 50 list include Peugeot, Paris; Bayerische Motoren Werke, Munich; Barilla, Parma, Italy; Gervais Danone, Levallois-Perret, France; RJR Nabisco, New York; Jacobs Suchard, Zurich; BAT Industries, London; British Telecom, London; Kingfisher, London; and Cole Myer, Sydney.

These 10 marketers replace Mazda Motor Corp., Hiroshima, Japan; Shiseido Co., Tokyo; Sony Corp., Tokyo; Ajinomoto Co., Tokyo; Mitsukoshi Ltd., Tokyo; Takeda Chemical Industries, Osaka; Daimaru Inc., Osaka; and Marui Co. and Hattori Seiko Co., both Tokyo.

Last year, Citroen was counted separately from Peugeot. This year, the two were combined.

Despite the decline in the number of Japanese companies represented on the list, 20 marketers of the top 50 are based in Japan. Eleven are U.S.-based. France put three on the list, while West Germany and Italy each claim three. The U.K. houses 4½, while the Netherlands claims 2½. The split is the result of Unilever, which claims roots in both countries. Switzerland houses two, while one calls Australia home.

Food marketers topped the list with 12 entries contributing $2.5 billion. However, the list's 11 automotive marketers contributed a whopping $3.1 billion. Soap and electrontics advertisers ranked six each on the top 50, while retailers accounted for five. Beer marketers accounted for four of the total, while telecommunications advertisers brought two to the list. Computer and photography marketers contributed one each.

Information for Ad Age's ranking of the top 50 spenders in non-U.S. advertising was compiled from data supplied from 38 major advertiser markets by AA's international network and sources around the world (see How to read this ranking on Page S-14). □

Newspapers shine as media choice

N. American books drive category

By R. Craig Endicott

Global newspapers outperformed weeklies and monthlies in 1989 in giving advertisers greater geographic distribution while holding a tighter rein on ad costs, according to Advertising Age's fifth annual Global Marketing & Media survey.

Newspapers, paced by the circulation growth of USA Today in the U.S. and abroad, held down the average increase for a full-page b&w ad to 4.6%, undercutting increases of 6.2% for monthlies and 7.7% for weekly magazines. Likewise, the medium's cost-per-thousand average increase of 5.7% bested the 5.9% average growth from monthlies and 6.2% from weeklies.

The study included 17 global publications selected because they are circulated on at least three continents, draw close to 10% of the worldwide circulation from international editions and have centralized ad buying. The study found newspapers are the medium of overall circulation growth (up 2%), mostly a reflection of their 2.1% boost in circulation in North America.

Using mass coverage as an ad criteria, global monthlies led with total circulation up 0.7% in 1989 to 41.5 million, far outstripping circulation of 11.9 million (down 2.6%) for weeklies and 4.3 million (up 2%) for newspapers.

The study shows that as goes North America so goes global media, because North American publications offer the big circulation base and English, the lingua franca of international marketing. Ten of the publications also happen to be U.S.-based.

North America accounted for 84.1% of the group's global circulation in newspapers, 81.1% of the weeklies' circulation and 69.8% of the monthlies'.

Paris-based Paris Match joined People's Daily out of the Republic of China in the study for the first time. People's Daily totals—circulation of 4 million and CPM of a minuscule 26¢—were excluded from newspaper composites because of the lack of prior-year data.

Advertising continues to be heavily consumer-oriented. From a list of the top five advertisers identified by each publisher, airlines were named 22 times, electronics/photographic equipment 13 and automobiles and financial institutions 11 each.

AT&T was the most frequently mentioned global advertiser. It was named by five publications as one of their top five advertisers. Lufthansa German Airlines ranked second with four mentions.

The impact of glasnost also has affected the global media market. World-Paper, produced from editorial offices in Boston, picked up 270,000 new subscribers in the U.S.S.R. for its monthly insertion in Novoe Vremija (New Times), a leading business magazine. □

Notes and sources: Advertising expenditures are in thousands of U.S. dollars for year-end 1988. In many countries, ad spending figures are estimates and/or gross figures. * indicates that U.S. spending figures include measured media only as reported by LNA/Arbitron Multi-Media reports. All other U.S. spending figures include estimated unmeasured expenditures, from AA's 100 Leading National Advertisers, Sept. 27, 1989. Non-US ad spending includes only countries in the column headed "Countries in which spending was reported." See also "How to read this ranking," Page S-14. Media explorers hunt for profits

"We've improved the bottom line. We hope to become profitable in a relatively short time."

"[Although we'll] never beat the FT on their own turf, we're not conceding the continent."
William A. Cummings

Mike Wilson
Asian Wall Street Journal

The pioneering publications with U.S. roots that marched overseas earlier in the 1980s are still struggling for profitability—but getting closer.

For most early entrants—USA Today International and The Wall Street Journal's regional editions—finding the right niche has been tough.

Since entering Europe in 1986, USA Today International has seen steady gains in both circulation and ad pages but still hasn't turned a profit. USA Today International President David Mazzarella wouldn't name profitability target dates or say if the initial goal of 1991 is achievable.

"We've improved the bottom line from one year to the next. We hope to become profitable in a relatively short time," he said.

A readership survey taken this year shows USA Today International's readers have an average household income of $119,084. About 87% are employed, 33% in top management, and 83% are involved in making business purchasing decisions. They're well-educated, with 77% holding college degrees.

Worldwide circulation will rise an estimated 6.6% to 1.81 million this year, led by a 13.5% increase in Europe to 40,100 and an 8.2% jump in Asia to 13,000.

Mr. Mazzarella maintains there's no direct competitor for readers because the majority of USA Today International's audience is American. Americans constitute more than 50% of the European edition's readers and more than 75% of the Asian edition's readers.

Another pioneer, The Wall Street Journal Europe, publishing since 1982, marked a milestone last April with its first monthly operating profit. Although the paper slid back into the red over the summer, it was in the black again in September.

William A. Cummings, WSJ/Europe publisher since last July, said he isn't aware of any target date for a break-even point or return on investment. Ad revenues in October were up 22% over the same month in 1988 and are expected to be up 5% for the entire year, he said.

WSJ/Europe competes directly against the Financial Times and, to a lesser extent, the International Herald Tribune.

Although Mr. Cummings conceded WSJ/Europe will "never beat the Financial Times on their own turf" in the U.K., he said, "We're not conceding the continent to anybody, the FT included."

One obstacle for WSJ/Europe is its fixed rate card. By contrast, many European publishers traditionally cut special deals off the rate card, but Mr. Cummings insisted The Journal's worldwide policy against rate-cutting won't change.

Dow Jones hopes persistence in Europe will pay off as it has in Asia. Almost 14 years after The Asian Wall Street Journal hit the newsstands, it boasts the largest share of the regional advertising market of any business publication.

The Rome Report, a research report that tracks international ad linage, showed that The Asian Wall Street Journal took a 13.5% slice of the roughly $111 million market in 1988, with slightly more than $15 million in revenues. That share placed it in the top position among business publications and third among all titles in the region. Only Time's and Newsweek's entries in the region had larger shares.

Rome Report figures for the first half of 1989 show The Asian Wall Street Journal maintaining its No. 3 spot overall, with a marginally increased 13.9% share of $55 million in ad spending in Asiawide publications for the first six months.

The falloff in the 1989 market, around 8% to 10% if increases in rate cards are taken into account, was due in part to the post-Olympic year, with spending levels down markedly, said AWSJ Publisher Mike Wilson, based in Hong Kong.

The Asian Wall Street Journal first turned a profit in 1982, said Karen Elliott House, Dow Jones VP-international. When the newspaper started printing in Tokyo in 1987, "costs were considerably higher" and the paper fell back into the red. "We're almost in the black now," she said.

Circulation hit 38,000 in late 1989, up 5% over 1988. The largest circulation growth has occurred in Hong Kong, Japan and South Korea. Hong Kong holds the lion's share with 27%, followed closely by Japan.

"A key element is that we have taken a product from the U.S. and molded it to the local market," Mr. Wilson said.

That's not the philosophy behind the Herald Tribune, said Publisher Lee Huebner. The newspaper, operating under its current name since 1967, is owned by the New York Times and The Washington Post and Whitney Communications.

"We seem to have held onto our readership in the face of [The Wall Street Journal/Europe, U.K.-based Financial Times] and USA Today," he said.

Even though a Herald Tribune study shows 40% of its own readers are Americans, its mission is different than the WSJ/Europe and USA Today.

Mr. Huebner believes the Herald Tribune's success is due in part to a generation of Europeans growing up speaking English and reading international publications.

He said the newspaper hopes to end the year with its best ad revenues ever, though he declined to give figures. For the first half of 1989, ad pages totaled 644, up 14.2% from the same period a year earlier.

Although not as financially focused, the Herald Tribune competes for some of the same ad dollars as The WSJ/Europe.

In Asia, it also competes with the Journal, but as an "imported"—not local—paper. However, competition could heat up if the Financial Times, WSJ's direct competitor in Europe, proceeds with a planned start-up in Tokyo next June.

The competition in both Europe and Asia is expected to intensify.

Keeping in mind a single European market in 1992, many U.S.-based publications in the past year have entered or announced plans to publish European editions.

In September, Meredith Corp. announced a joint venture with the U.K.'s Associated Newspapers to launch a U.K. edition of Metropolitan Home. Last month, Life made known its plans to test local editions with local joint-venture partners in three European countries.

In September, Hearst Corp. created a new international unit, Hearst Magazines International, to expand the company's publishing business outside the U.S. Hearst President Frank A. Bennack Jr. at the time said globalization and 1992 would have a dramatic effect on the commuications industry and especially on magazine publishing.

Forbes is taking its long-running battle with Fortune overseas (AA, Oct. 16) and Reader's Digest Association is looking at overseas editions of special-interest titles through an expanded international group. □

New magazines seek Japanese women

By David Kilburn

Social trends and a booming ad market are turning magazines that target women into a hot medium in Japan.

"The market has changed dramatically," said Yukinori Ohta, publisher of Media Info, a Japanese-language trade magazine.

A host of new titles are geared toward the relatively new phenomenon in Japan of working women who are loaded with disposable income.

"The mass market splintered into a host of smaller markets. Publishers have found they can be very successful with magazines with circulations of about 300,000," Mr. Ohta said.

About $2.1 billion was spent on advertising in Japan's 2,181 magazines in 1988, Dentsu reported. This represents a 14.9% jump from 1987, a gain that was 2.9 percentage points ahead of the increase in total ad spending.

That same year, magazines grabbed a 6.7% share of advertising in Japan, up from 6.5% in 1987, the report stated.

Also, 79 magazines ceased publication in 1988, the lowest number of closures this decade, while 131 titles were launched.

New approaches to women's magazines have been major successes. There are magazines launched within the past few years for the career woman, such as Nihon Keizai Shimbun's Nikkei Woman; for the woman-as-housewife, including Kadokawa's Peach; and for the mother-to-be, such as the aptly named Balloon from Shufunomoto. Last year, about 24 million magazines a month were sold to women.

Circulation of these women's magazines ranges from 100,000 to 1.5 million. Ad rates run $2,800 to $17,600 for a color page.

Even retailers are publishing to women, trying to woo female customers while promoting goods and services. These magazines—filled with copy about family, money, travel and cooking—are successful because they're produced as professional magazines and not as store hand-outs.

The Daiei, a leading supermarket chain, sells Orange Page, while leading department store Seibu publishes Lettuce Club.

Both magazines, available on newsstands only, are published twice monthly. Orange Page has average circulation of more than 1 million, and Lettuce Club claims 800,000. Top advertisers in both include such big names as Kao Corp. and Lion Corp. A color page ad in Orange Page costs $16,200 and $13,400 in Lettuce Club.

Balloon and other Japanese magazines for women are riding high.

Like most successful media in Japan—where self-imposed ad limits make demand outstrip supply—"it's hard to get advertising space in either," said Yoshitomo Maeda, media director at J. Walter Thompson Co.

Another magazine, Hanako, published by Magazine House, attracts affluent, cosmopolitan female readers. Hanako, launched last year, is the first regional weekly for women. Aimed at women in their 20s working in metropolitan Tokyo, its 350,000 circulation is restricted to that area. A color page ad costs $8,400. Major advertisers include Toyota Motor and Japan Airlines.

Hanako is a refinement of the targeting idea, said Ron Sternberg, an editor at Tarzan, a sister publication.

"By targeting Tokyo readers, we gained a much sharper identity and exclusivity for the magazine than we could have otherwise. This helps advertisers find their targets," he said.

Many of Hanako's readers have considerable spending power. Almost all their earnings can go for discretionary purchases. Often these women are living in their family homes rent-free. On dates, men pay. When they go to work, the company pays, even for commuting and clothing.

Readers of Hanako, called the Hanako-zoku (meaning Hanako tribe) are considered a valuable market by advertisers, and the term Hanako-zoku has entered the language.

"Targeting is the key. There will continue to be a lot of new activity [in specialized magazines] for at least another three years or so," Mr. Ohta said.

Mr. Maeda added: "Advertisers want to segment their targets much more narrowly. Many of these [new specialty magazines] are aimed at narrow segments of consumers that can be reached with less waste." □

HOW TO COMMUNICATE WITH 320 MILLION EUROPEANS.

To American marketers and advertisers the continent of Europe presents a nightmare of 12 different countries with 9 different languages and innumerable differences in culture, market situation and buying patterns.

However, there is a way to communicate to Europe's 320 million consumers without tackling each country individually.

The Two's Company way. Two's Company is the specialist in international marketing communications.

For the past ten years, we have helped companies treat Europe as a single, large market for their products and services.

From one central location in The Netherlands, we develop pan-European and global campaigns that communicate a single creative positioning to many different markets.

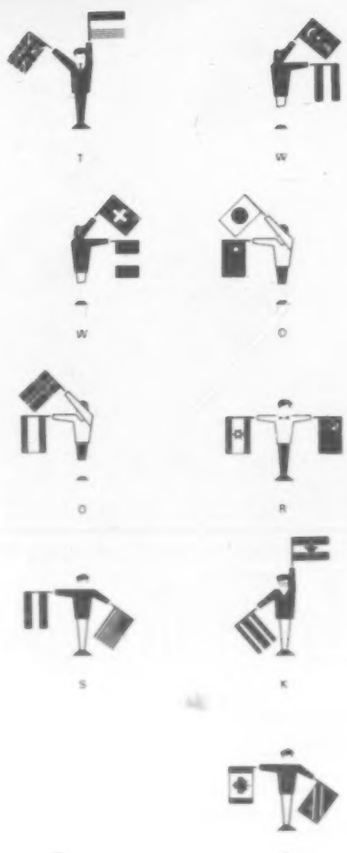
We also offer an integrated programme of below-the-line services to ensure that your brand presents a consistent identity not just across borders but also across different media.

This approach saves you the cost of producing 12 different campaigns and gives you central control over all your marketing communications.

So if you want to get the best out of marketing in Fortress Europe, do what several other American companies have done. Talk to Two's Company.

After all, we know the market and we speak your language.

For a copy of the Two's Company brochure, contact Maude Bronzman, Two's Company, P. O. Box 5585, Santa Rosa, CA 95402, Tel: 707-573-0501. Fax: 707-573-0701.



THAT'S WHY TWO'S COMPANY IS DIFFERENT.

Two's Company bv, Parmentierweg 14, 5657 EH Eindhoven, The Netherlands, Tel: 01131-40-550605 Fax: 01131-40-522524

Global marketing. Make it your most profitable business strategy ever.

As a vendor of computer products, you know the international high-tech market is growing at a phenomenal rate. And you know global marketing is the business strategy you need. To maximize your sales efforts worldwide and to ensure your company's success, for the short term and well into the 1990's.

But you find yourself facing major roadblocks:

- I don't know which foreign markets are most compatible for my products
- I can't identify the international end-user sites that use products like mine
- I haven't located an international distributor
- I don't have the time or staff to research all of the international possibilities

This is where we come into the picture. At International Marketing Services, we can solve any one of these problems for you—or give you a powerful, all-encompassing package that satisfies all of your marketing needs. We call it our "Exporter's Package"—and here's how it can work for you.

International Advertising. Deliver your message to buyers of computer products and services via our network of over 80 publications in 30 countries.

International Market Research. Use our Worldwide Technology Reports to identify the best markets for expanding your global selling and marketing efforts.

International Databases. Target only the buyers you need to reach through IDG's International Computer Installation and VAR Databases.

Distributor/Locator Service. Identify and meet key distributors of your products worldwide.

International PR Service. Get your press release into the hands of over 300 international editors and analysts—fast—with the new electronic IDG PR Service.

Foreign Government Buying Alert. Explore volume sales opportunities in hard-to-reach foreign government markets when you receive customized buyer contacts via fax. Plus—benefit from a follow-up call-in service.

No other information industry service company can provide more information and more opportunity for you. For 20 years IDG has been making the world a little smaller by breaking down information industry trade barriers. Now, with International Marketing Services, global reach and local buy are more than just marketing concepts. Give Frank Cutitta, President/IMS, a call today at 1-800-343-6474 (in MA, 508-879-0700). Media target Soviet visitors

By John Iams

As the Soviet Union comes of age in the international business community, the 2 million people who visit the country each year are an untapped market.

So says Victor Bondarenko, a former construction engineer who emigrated from the Soviet Union to the U.S. in 1978. Now a VP at Zig-Zag International, a New York agency, Mr. Bondarenko's ambitions include launching several new vehicles targeting these visitors.

Zig-Zag has formed a joint venture called Intoureklama with state-run tourist agency Intourist. Intoureklama plans to launch an 80-page glossy travel magazine, Passport to the U.S.S.R., by next summer.

The every-other-monthly will carry up to 30 pages of advertising and about 50 pages of editorial. Mr. Bondarenko said he will solicit advertising from Soviet and Western marketers but wouldn't disclose names of companies he's targeting.

The magazines will be placed in rooms of Intourist hotels catering to international travelers and through major travel companies such as American Express Co.

"Our primary goal is to target all foreigners coming here from the U.S., Japan, Britain and Europe," Mr. Bondarenko said.

"We are going to publish a guide about the Soviet Union, what's happening in Moscow, including entertainment and cultural events," he said.

Visitors here have little to inform them of what's going on, except for official tourist guides.

Initial plans call for a pressrun of 200,000 copies of Passport to the U.S.S.R., he said.

A color page will cost $5,000, according to Mr. Bondarenko.

After getting the magazine off the ground, Mr. Bondarenko hopes to follow with a cable TV service for hotels catering to foreigners.

"We are planning to install [closed circuit] cable TV systems in every state-run Intourist hotel, using modern equipment," he said.

Some hotels now have in-house cable, but they don't offer the kind of programming Mr. Bondarenko plans, such as up-to-date information on current events, entertainment or even a guide on where to get a good meal.

Advertising will include a guide to restaurants such as the Japanese, French, Indian, Italian and U.S. restaurants that have opened in the Soviet capital. Ad rates haven't been set. □

How to read rankings, media chart

Advertising Age's third annual ranking of major advertisers outside the U.S. and fifth annual Global Media lineup contain data from every continent except Antarctica.

Global marketers

The advertiser ranking on Page S-2 includes spending figures from 38 countries. Ad Age correspondents compiled the data. Depending on availability of reliable spending data, country lists ran from as many as 100 advertisers to only the top 10 spenders.

Research companies, media tracking services, marketing publications and ad agencies were various sources for the data. In some countries, ad spending is reported according to rate cards. When necessary, gross rates were discounted by AA editors to better reflect spending in the market. There is no standard procedure for monitoring ad spending worldwide, so advertising data may be accumulated by brands, subsidiary or parent company.

Wherever possible, spending reported by brand or subsidiary was assigned to the parent, whose names have been "Americanized" in this ranking.

Sources are listed beneath the tables titled "Top 10 advertisers by country" starting on Page S-8. All figures are given in U.S. dollars. Source lines include currency conversion rates for both 1988 and 1987 unless research companies provided the figures in U.S. dollars.

Global media

Circulation data collected from publishers in this report were for June 1989 compared with June 1988. Ad rates were those in effect at the same mid-year period.

Criteria for a publication's inclusion in the chart on Page S-4 are:

- Substantial mass circulation on at least three continents.
- Worldwide circulation of at least 50,000 and circulation of international editions equal to at least 10% of the domestic circulation.
- Editorial content global in scope.
- Advertising in all editions purchased through a central office.

Trade publications aren't mass-circulation publications and are excluded from this listing.

Licensed publications are also excluded, because they lack central control on the advertising side. □

Cigarette skid continues

Though industry could gain slightly in 1990

By John C. Maxwell Jr.

Cigarette volume is expected to drop 6% to almost 525 billion units for 1989.

But the drop isn't as severe in real terms because anticipated cutbacks were made in trade inventories.

R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co. aggressively tried to eliminate excessive trade inventories by discontinuing its end-of-quarter promotional programs effective with the third quarter.

Lorillard also didn't have any promotional programs starting with the third quarter.

These actions dramatically lowered shipments to the trade, distorting year-to-year comparisons.

Had RJR and Lorillard maintained their historical promotional strategies, it's estimated industry volume would be down about 3% or more.

The fact that 15 states raised excise taxes during the year, compared with only four in 1988, also contributed to the volume drop.

If retail consumption drops around 2.5% in 1990 (assuming no further aggressive state tax hikes), the industry total would be flat or slightly up from 1989's inventory-reduced 524.62 billion units.

So, market share numbers will be volatile and possibly somewhat deceptive in the near term.

It appears Philip Morris Cos.' unit volume advanced slightly in 1989, with market share reaching almost 42%, well ahead of 1988's 39.3% share.

The Philip Morris flagship brand, Marlboro, gained nearly 2 share points. Virginia Slims achieved a slight share increase, aided by the Superslims line extension launched in October.

There was no significant change in the ranking from last year of the top 10 brands, which represent more than 70% of the cigarettes sold. □

Computer helps smokers sign off

By Patricia Winters

Now there's a computer that can help you stop smoking.

Health Innovations is rolling national with LifeSign, a system that features a hand-held computer to help smokers kick the habit.

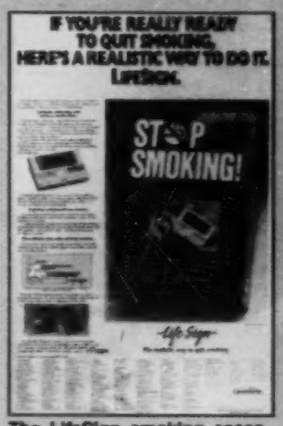
The patented system retails for $79.95 and in November was named as one of Popular Science's 100 "Best of What's New."

The smoker starts the LifeSign program by pressing the computer's smoke button each time he has a cigarette. After a week, the smoker can only light up when the computer tells him. Gradually, the computer lengthens the intervals between cigarettes until the smoker isn't allowed any.

The withdrawal process takes from 14 to 28 days.

Invented five years ago, LifeSign was previously sold only to employee health benefits programs and by direct mail to the public. Advertising was limited to direct sales on cable TV and small print ads.

The company began testing sales of the system in retail outlets in July; it's now available in more than 200 markets in the Northeast, mid-Atlantic, parts of the West Coast and in Arizona.



The LifeSign smoking cessation system is getting print support as it expands.

Health Innovations is running a heavy schedule of spot TV and cable advertising, as well as a 30-minute cable "infomercial," and print ads in USA Today, The New Yorker, Time and other major publications.

Hawthorne Communications, Fairfield, Iowa, created the 30-minute infomercial, while Media Basics, New York, handles other broadcast advertising. Novus Marketing, Minneapolis, does print.

LifeSign was invented by psychologist Lee Fredrickson and computer specialists Don Link and Al Behar. Messrs. Fredrickson and Behar both quit smoking through the program, said Betsy Lingel, Health Innovations marketing director.

Ms. Lingel said sales of LifeSign are skyrocketing, although she didn't disclose revenues.

The program includes a 48-page guide on long-term techniques to stay off cigarettes. Systems sold at retail include a promotional videotape on kicking tobacco. The program also offers an 800 phone number with trained staff to answer questions and lend support.

Health Innovations said its success rate is 18% to 27% one year after using the product—a rate it claims is more effective than other self-help methods. □

Study boosts men's buying role

By Scott Donaton

Most men today don't bring home the bacon until they've checked the label first, a new survey on men's food shopping habits shows.

The study, conducted in September for Rodale Press' Men's Health, revealed that men make more than half of their family's brand purchase decisions in such categories as soups, cereals, soft drinks and snack foods.

The study also showed that 43% of men who are married or living with someone either shop with their significant others or do a large portion of the grocery shopping themselves.

Although the study isn't the first to chart the increase of male participation in traditionally female chores, Men's Health Executive Editor Michael Lafavore said it's one of the first to show that men today are as brand-conscious as women.

"The stereotype of the American male as someone who is oblivious to one brand of soap or cereal and another, who never buys anything but beer, razor blades and motor oil . . . just isn't true anymore," he said. Reasons for the perceived shift in men's attitudes include the increase in dual-income households and the rising divorce rate, the survey indicates.

Among men who are married or living with someone, the study found, 53% usually choose their family's brand of breakfast cereal, 51% choose the soup, 61% select the snack foods and 63% make most of the soft-drink buying decisions.

Areas in which men still defer to women include baby products (53% of those surveyed said the male never or almost never makes decisions on these products), spices and seasonings (66%) and cleaning products (69%).

Strictly defined "gender roles and responsibilities are blurring," said Michael Rooney, publisher of Men's Health. Yet, men are still largely ignored by food marketers, he said.

The study found that men's brand choices are influenced heavily by the traditional factors of price (72%) and experience in using the product (82%).

The telephone poll of a total of 993 men and women was conducted by Opinion Research Corp. during the week of Sept. 8. The margin of error is plus or minus 3%. □

Gen'l Mills/Nestle joint venture

tures with U.S. companies would include Paris-based BSN Group and its Gervais Dannon unit, as well as the U.K.'s United Biscuits.

U.S. companies that could benefit include Campbell Soup Co. and Quaker Oats Co., this source said.

"The criterion would be any company that is already present but doesn't have sufficient clout in its own right with the trade," he said.

Allan McCusker, a principal of the Caanan Parrish Group, a consultancy, called the General Mills/Nestle agreement "a marriage made in heaven."

He said cereal is a perfect fit since consumption in many European markets, including France, Italy and Spain, is extremely low.

Credit Suisse First Boston's Mr. Facon said he views the General Mills/Nestle deal as an unusual situation: a rapidly growing business (cereals in Europe) with a well-entrenched leader (Kellogg Co.), an eager competitor (General Mills) and a powerful local marketer (Nestle).

"I don't think there are too many situations like this that can be replicated," Mr. Facon said.

Charles Gaillard, who served as general manager of General Mills' Big G (cereal) Division for 10 years, will be ceo of the new company. His current title is senior VP-international foods for General Mills.

"Some of the brands marketed in Europe will be brands marketed here [in the U.S.]," said Craig Shulstad, General Mills' director of media and financial relations. Likely suspects would be Cheerios and Wheaties.

Each will carry the Nestle corporate name, and at least initially, will be manufactured in Nestle's three European cereal plants.

The companies also have committed to an agreement providing that neither will seek control of the other.

Although observers didn't dismiss the notion that Nestle might be interested in acquiring General Mills, "I think Nestle is happy with where they are in the U.S.," Mr. Facon said.

"They wanted a critical mass in the U.S., and they now have $7 billion in sales there," he said. "Now I think they will let margins go up; I don't expect them to make any major moves for the near term."

For General Mills, second in the $6 billion U.S. cereal market but a negligible player overseas, the joint venture offers a way to challenge Kellogg in Europe while avoiding a long learning curve.

"General Mills would not have been able to make much progress on its own. But this combines great products with great distribution and marketing strength," said Timothy Ramey, County NatWest Securities analyst.

"Kellogg had operations in Europe before we started selling cereal," Mr. Shulstad said. "We approached Nestle; we think a joint venture is the most efficient way to become a major competitive force in the European cereal market and expand into other areas."

Only about 10% of General Mills' $6 billion in total sales comes from foreign operations—and most of that from Red Lobster restaurants and Canadian food operations.

General Mills estimates total European cereal sales at $1.6 billion, or about one-fourth that of the U.S.

But the company said it predicts a quadrupling of sales in the next 10 years—or a 15% compounded annual growth rate.

"What's attracted consumers in this country to cereals is beginning to attract European consumers as well—healthfulness and convenience," Mr. Shulstad said.

Some, however, said General Mills' growth estimates are optimistic.

"The market for ready-meal breakfasts is going to expand very rapidly. But I'm not confident it will be just cereals, but yogurts and other products, too," Mr. Facon said.

Although growing, the cereal business in most countries outside the U.S. still is small. Per capita consumption in such developed markets as West Germany and France is less than 2 pounds, compared with more than 10 pounds in the U.S. and about 12.8 in England, 12.3 in Australia, 8.5 in Canada and 4.6 in Denmark.

The most rapid growth is in France and Italy, growing at more than 20% a year for cereal consumption, and West Germany, at 8% to 10% a year, according to U.K. research company Euromonitor.

Kellogg, which started its overseas business in the U.K. in 1922, dominates the cereal business outside North America. The company has a 51.8% dollar share of the overseas cereal market, compared with 41.5% in the U.S.

Chairman-CEO William LaMothe has said he expects 50% of Kellogg's sales to come from overseas markets by the end of the century (compared with about 36% now).

"Kellogg has had a great time in part because none of the big three European food companies—BSN Groupe, Unilever or Nestle—has been able to figure out the cereal business," Mr. Facon said.

Quaker Oats is the only other of the six U.S. cereal marketers to have a solid presence in Europe (see chart).

Kraft General Foods Group distributes its Post cereals only in South Korea. Ralston Purina Co. is just beginning to distribute its human food products in Europe. And Nabisco Brands is only a small player in limited markets.

"We're used to competing in a very competitive U.S. market where Kellogg has a dominant share," General Mills' Mr. Shulstad said. "We think there's room for more than one company in this business."

The deal gives Nestle, already challenging or overtaking Quaker for second place in the markets where they compete, the power to take on Kellogg directly.

"I wouldn't say we'd beat Kellogg," said Michel Reinarz, Nestle's director of visual communications. "Kellogg is a formidable competitor and they know their business, but at last we're hoping to give them a good challenge."

Nestle entered the French ready-to-eat cereal market in 1984 and has already captured a 12% share, rapidly narrowing the gap with second-place Quaker, whose share declined to 16% of the market in 1988 from 20% when Nestle launched, Euromonitor reported.

Nestle is second behind Kellogg in the Spanish cereal market with a 15% share, and ahead of Kellogg in Portugal with a 15% share. The marketer also is testing its cereals in West Germany.

And Nestle already has discovered that Kellogg isn't untouchable overseas.

County NatWest Securities' Mr. Ramey said Nestle recently introduced two new cereals in Japan, where Kellogg held a 77.5% share. After three months of distribution, that figure dropped to 62.3%.

Publicis in France and McCann-Erickson in Spain, Portugal and West Germany launched the Nestle cereals and are Nestle's preferred cereal agencies. That designation means they keep that category free for Nestle and are recommended to local Nestle subsidiaries (AA, Sept. 18).

General Mills agencies Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising, which also works for Nestle in France, Germany and Canada, and DDB Needham Worldwide also could be in the running for assignments from the joint venture company.

"I would say that we have in our alignment agencies that are free to handle cereals," Mr. Reinarz said. "If they want no problems and to know the agencies are free and committed to cereal development, I'd recommend they choose among them. If they say, hey guys, we have long-term relationships [with another agency] and they know the cereal business, I'm not going to stand in the way. It's up to the joint venture to decide."

An international McCann source said, "Are we making calls on this right now? Yes, of course."

Joseph Mack, chairman of Saatchi & Saatchi, New York, General Mills' lead cereal agency, said he hopes Saatchi can become agency for the joint venture.

"We do have Nestle as a client in some markets, but they [Nestle and General Mills] haven't had those discussions yet," he said.

Mr. Mack called the idea of a joint venture to break into the European market a sound one.

"They're putting together an extraordinarily powerful sales and distribution and manufacturing potential of one company with brilliant R&D, technology and marketing brand experience with another company," he said, "and it's just a wonderful fit." □ rather than the natural chicken breast fillet used for the fried chicken sandwiches at McDonald's and Wendy's International and the grilled chicken sandwich at Hardee's Food Systems.

But Burger King can play off the consumer perception that broiled foods have less cholesterol, fewer calories and are more healthful than fried foods.

The BK Broiler is 379 calories topped with Ranch Sauce, 289 calories without the sauce. That compares with more than 600 calories for the Chicken Specialty sandwich now on Burger King's menu nationally.

The BK Broiler is most similar to the 330-calorie Grilled Chicken Breast Sandwich (served on a natural-grain bun) introduced earlier this year by Hardee's. That sandwich was one of the last projects Gary Langstaff worked on at Hardee's before moving to head Burger King's marketing department.

Kentucky Fried Chicken Corp., the No. 1 chicken chain, isn't taking all this action sitting down. It's testing charbroiled chicken in Las Vegas, Nev.

But Burger King will have an added—and so far exclusive—health positioning by serving its sandwich on an oat bran bun.

The new Kids Club program for children is even more ambitious than the chain's menu moves.

Like competitors' meals for children, Burger King's are anchored by a succession of premiums, most of which are tied to popular toys or cartoon characters.

The program starts in January with miniature, mobile toys shaped like menu items (such as a bag of fries or soft drink).

In February and March, badges tied to the popular "Teenage Mutant Ninja Turtles" characters will be offered. In April and May, the premiums will be figurines of characters in ABC-TV's animated "Beetlejuice" series.

Planned for June and July are vehicles and characters created to represent members of the Kids Club.

In August and September, Kids Club meals will include miniature versions of Hasbro's Record Breakers cars.

But Burger King plans its Kids Club to be more comprehensive than competitors' programs. Children will be invited to join the club, which offers members a personalized membership card, stickers and a poster featuring Kids Club characters.

Also, a four-page newspaper, to be published five times a year, will be distributed in-store. It will include everything from film and video reviews to previews of upcoming premiums. Members also can buy a Kids Club clubhouse they can play in at home.

Ericson Freeman, Paramus, N.J., and August, Bishop & Meier, Chicago, handle promotional marketing for Burger King.

The Kids Club program means Burger King once again will begin network TV advertising on Saturday mornings, a media buy it has shunned for nearly a decade. Six flights on Saturdays are planned through September.

The chain also will advertise the Kids Club on Nickelodeon and other cable TV channels with high viewership among children, as well as with spot buys during syndicated programming on independent TV stations.

Saatchi & Saatchi is believed to be taking the lead in creating media ad support for children's marketing. □

Burger King Kids Club premium schedule

Burger King has planned premiums for its new children's marketing program through the first three quarters of 1990. Several will benefit from additional, outside marketing support as well.

American Express Co. has scored a major coup by snaring actor Paul Newman for an upcoming ad campaign.

The company also might be on the verge of signing actress Meryl Streep.

Both superstars are well-known holdouts against endorsement deals with Madison Avenue and have high credibility among consumers. Neither has ever appeared in a national commercial ad campaign.

Mr. Newman's public relations agency, Rogers & Cowan, confirmed the actor is planning to do "an AmEx commercial" but declined to give details.

Ms. Streep's agent, International Creative Management, declined comment, but other industry sources said she's negotiating an agreement with AmEx.

Word of the AmEx deals leaked out soon after rival Visa International announced its high-profile agreement with former Beatle Paul McCartney (see story on Page 50).

Under that arrangement, Visa will sponsor the 1990 leg of the singer's tour and Mr. McCartney will appear in an $8.5 million TV campaign for Visa.

What's not widely known is that AmEx also tried to strike a deal with Mr. McCartney, but those negotiations fell through.

Just what kind of deals Mr. Newman and Ms. Streep have fashioned or are about to fashion with AmEx couldn't be determined. Company officials refused comment.

But sources say the stars are signing with the credit card giant for somewhere between $2 million and $5 million apiece and that both are demanding creative control over any advertising.

Sources including former AmEx marketing executives, ad agency executives specializing in credit card marketing, rival card marketers and top talent executives suggest two possible uses of the stars.

WPP struggles with units

By Gary Levin

NEW YORK—WPP Group is developing its own trouble spots.

Although these problems aren't as serious as Saatchi & Saatchi Co.'s current woes, they're cause for concern among WPP watchers, who want to know whether Chief Executive Martin Sorrell can manage people as well as acquisitions.

The Harvard Group, a 7-year-old financial marketing agency here purchased by WPP in 1987, appears to have shut down last month.

The agency's president-ceo, marketing director and creative director have all left WPP, and a woman who answered the phone in its former Madison Avenue office said she believed the company was "out of business." Other WPP executives confirmed the unit had been "dissolved."

Despite the absence of any clients, operating personnel and current phone listing, WPP maintains the Harvard Group is still operating.

Lewis Trencher, the financial controller for WPP's Rasor Communications U.S. holding company, said he's the "person in charge" of Harvard, which he maintained is now operating from WPP's U.S. headquarters.

"We are pursuing real estate projects similar to the ones Harvard has done, and we're in the process of getting our house in order," Mr. Trencher said. "We're exploring various options that we have in developing new business."

In addition to Harvard, WPP has privately acknowledged to analysts that it's

Pepsi ups stakes

Boosts diet TV spending by 50%

By Patricia Winters

Pepsi-Cola Co., in an offensive strike against market leader Coca-Cola Co., will hike first-quarter network TV spending by 50% for reformulated Diet Pepsi and caffeine-free Diet Pepsi.

Pepsi has notified bottlers it will break new TV advertising Jan. 1 to support the reformulation. Commercials carry the new "The right one" theme from BBDO Worldwide, New York.

Breaking the new effort weeks before the Super Bowl, traditionally the showcase for unveiling major campaigns, shows Pepsi is staging an early attack on Coca-Cola.

An industry source said Pepsi implied in a letter to bottlers that first-quarter network spending for Diet Pepsi and its caffeine-free partner will be up 50% from a year ago, making them "the most talked-about soft drinks."

The company's spot TV spending plans are unclear, but one rumor is that Pepsi plans to hike total first-quarter advertising for the two products by as much as 90%.

In the first quarter of 1989, Pepsi spent about $20 million in measured media on Diet Pepsi and caffeine-free Diet Pepsi. About $8 million went to network TV, reported BAR/LNA Multi-Media Service. Diet Coke and caffeine-free Diet Coke got about $27 million in support, with about $15 million going to network TV.

"This is going to be some battle," the industry source said. "[Pepsi] is coming out with its guns blazing, that's for sure."

A Pepsi spokeswoman said the company

Next for Saatchis: Spielvogel face-off?

By Jon Lafayette and Laurel Wentz

With Saatchi & Saatchi Co.'s disastrous 1989 financial results behind him, new Chief Executive Robert Louis-Dreyfus' biggest challenge may now come from Carl Spielvogel.

Mr. Spielvogel, chairman-ceo of Saatchi-owned Backer Spielvogel Bates Worldwide, New York, has irritated Saatchi executives in the past by publicly stating his willingness to buy either his agency or the whole company.

"Every time something goes wrong with the holding company, he makes a deliberate attempt to say, 'Well, of course, if I were running it, it would all be different,' " an annoyed Saatchi executive said. "He's had his wrists pretty firmly slapped, but you don't want to go on slapping his wrist."

Last week, as Saatchi reported a $91.8 million net loss for its fiscal year, Mr. Spielvogel maintained a discreet silence. But among those said to be upset with Mr. Spielvogel for his past remarks are co-founder Charles Saatchi and Mr. Louis-Dreyfus.

Saatchi sources hint Mr. Saatchi and his brother, Maurice, would sooner fire Mr. Spielvogel than sell him the agency. "No one is irreplaceable," another senior Saatchi executive said.

If Mr. Spielvogel continued to needle his London-based managers, Mr. Louis-Dreyfus would most likely terminate him on grounds that "this isn't in the best interests of the company," the executive said, adding, "I think we could all live with that."

For his part, Mr. Spielvogel last week denied he'd been reprimanded by anyone at Saatchi and declined to comment on Saatchi's poor earnings.

But in a memo to the Backer staff, he said, "The financial results at the parent company will not in any way affect our service to clients, our staffing or our ability to continue to provide long-term rewards for our career professionals."

At the same time, Saatchi officials tried to downplay the seriousness of Mr. Spielvogel's takeover ambitions. They claim to have written assurances from Prudential-Bache Securities that the investment banker won't finance an unfriendly bid from a Saatchi employee, such as Mr. Spielvogel.

Mr. Spielvogel previously had said Prudential-Bache, a Backer client, would back him in a friendly bid for Saatchi or his agency.

Skepticism has been expressed about the existence of such assurances to the Saatchis from the investment banker, and Mr. Spielvogel wouldn't comment on whether he's still interested in a buyback or takeover bid.

Because of its widely publicized financial troubles, Saatchi has been eyed as a potential takeover target, but there's also speculation the company might try to go private if an acquisition bid surfaces. Others have surmised Mr. Louis-Dreyfus was brought in to rebuild Saatchi's market value so the company could fetch a higher price if the Saatchis ever decide to sell out.

Either way, as the personalities put their spin to this internal jockeying, agency watchers don't expect Mr. Spielvogel to stay quiet for very long.

"If you look back over his rec-

Chrysler picks media chief

By Raymond Serafin

HIGHLAND PARK, Mich.—Chrysler Motors plans to create a new in-house position to coordinate the media strategies of its three automotive divisions and their agencies.

Sources say the advertising media relations manager post will go to Arthur Kesteloot, a former ad manager and now merchandising manager for Dodge cars. Mr. Kesteloot will report to John Damoose, named to the new position of VP-brand marketing when Chrysler began overhauling its marketing operations last month (AA, Nov. 13). At that time, Chrysler consolidated its three divisional marketing groups into one operation under Mr. Damoose.

Chrysler VP-Consumer Affairs Laurel Cutler said last week the realignment signaled Chrysler's official shift to a "category brand management system." She compared the Chrysler changes with Procter & Gamble Co.'s overhaul of its brand management system in late 1987, when a single general manager was put in charge of all brands and products in a single category.

Mr. Kesteloot's job will be to get Chrysler the most bang for its estimated $400 million media spending budget. In part, he will try to ensure that the company's three divisions don't compete with one another in the marketplace.

Mr. Kesteloot's job will be to get Chrysler the most bang for its estimated $400 million media spending budget.

BBDO Worldwide, Southfield, handles Dodge; Bozell, Birmingham, handles Chrysler-Plymouth; and Campbell-Mithun-Esty, Southfield, handles Jeep/Eagle.

The new Chrysler position isn't expected to initially include the breadth of sweeping powers over media and agency decisions held by Philip Guarascio, executive director of advertising and strategic merchandising at General Motors Corp.

Mr. Guarascio, first brought in as an expert on media, has led GM's recent initiatives into program production and category exclusivity in spot TV commercial pods.

At Chrysler, the decision to create a centralized media coordinator comes as the automaker concentrates on its core business to become more competitive. At the same time, the company is cutting fixed costs by $1 billion.

Chrysler officials and agencies have been discussing for several months how the shops can contribute to the $1 billion savings. The final decision is likely to include tightening up production and other costs, combined with a possible reduction in agency commission rates, sources say.

Further streamlining of marketing operations is expected within the three divisions, each of which now has two ad and two merchandising managers. □

Ted Turner hones his Midas touch

Cable's one-time maverick presides over solidified empire and takes a thoughtful look at cable's true mission

Ted Turner is setting his sights on a true global news network, world peace and an improved environment in the next decade.

His seemingly seat-of-the-pants gambles since he inherited his father's failing outdoor advertising company in 1963 have helped shape what has become the fragmented media world of today.

Whatever the 1990s might bring, Mr. Turner and his Turner Broadcasting System expect to be a part of it. But at age 50, the once-flamboyant "mouth of the South" seems to have mellowed.

His media empire, once seemingly destined to drown in its own red ink, has never been stronger. Advertising Age reporter Wayne Walley caught up with Mr. Turner in Atlanta.

AA: What will we see from Ted Turner in the 1990s?

Mr. Turner: The vast bulk of our efforts are centered on cable growth and the growth of our services within the cable universe. I still believe the 1990s will be the cable decade even more so than the 1980s.

Cable began the decade in 20% of U.S. households, roughly, and will leave the decade in 60% of U.S. households. That's a very, very significant change.

In the next three or four years, 70% penetration will be achieved. There's no question in my mind that by the end of the 1990s, 75% of U.S. households will be cable or direct broadcast satellite subscribers.

AA: How will advertisers fit into cable's growth in the 1990s?

Mr. Turner: Cable networks have passed the critical point and are now considered mainstream by almost all agencies and advertisers.

Cable's audience is growing rapidly. The audience for the three broadcast networks and the independent stations are all shrinking. As the audience flows more and more to cable, the advertising dollars are going to flow there as well, probably even more rapidly because cable is selling premium demographics.

AA: Program content became a big issue this year. Did what happened with the Big 3 networks, Fox Broadcasting and syndication shed a bad light on all television?

Mr. Turner: Not all television, broadcast television . . . Listen to this [referring to a story clip]. Networks prepare for sweeps battle. ABC is pinning some of its sweeps hopes on the two-part miniseries, "Small Sacrifices," about a woman convicted of shooting her three small children.

NBC's sweeps programming—they are the worst ones—consists of four specials that are the most bizarre type of murders, killings and rape and sodomy and the worst things possible. Disgusting.

They are going sleazier than ever. Shooting her three small children. That's just wonderful. Something the whole family should watch together, right? One [program] on NBC is about murder on New Year's eve. What a way to ring in the new year. If I was an advertiser, I wouldn't want to be on any of those shows.

Then look at what we're doing on TNT. The "Butter Battle Book," a Gary Cooper retrospective and "Cold Sassy Tree." "Nightbreaker" is about nuclear war and nuclear testing. We've done exactly what we've said we're going to do: we have taken the high road and . . . we are going to stay that way.

AA: Do you see cable eventually superceding the Big 3 as the dominant source for Laugh all you want, but the new comedy networks are helping crowd what some say is an already jammed channel selector. Barometer evaluates some new entries' chances:

The Cowboy Channel . . . It'll probably rope 'em in in Austin, but we reckon it won't find enough homes on the range.

Mizlou Sports News Network . . . Faces stiff competition from regional sports channels and ESPN, but programming promises to be different. Will be a tough call.

CNBC . . . It's crying out for an identity and a bigger allowance from its parent. Will probably end up orphaned.

The Sci-Fi Channel . . . To boldly where no network has gone before should help launch this off-beat concept.

The Comedy Channel . . . Got a jump on HA! but programming will determine who has last laugh.

HA! TV Comedy Network . . . Won't know until April who's the fool, but MTV's winning track record probably says it all.

Sports channel glut

Observers worry fans may have gotten their fill

By David J. Wallace

Mizlou Sports News Network should bear in mind what happened to the World Football League.

The WFL struggled along for a few years before it was squashed by the National Football League and sports fans' lack of interest.

SNN will enter a similar scenario in February when the Mizlou Communications Co. property will make its debut. Cable sports, dominated by ESPN on the national level and several regional networks, may be on the verge of saturation, observers say.

"There are more teams, more sports and more [viewing] choices. But the sports fan's total viewing audience has remained relatively flat," says Robert Gold, VP-PR for Prime Ticket Network, Los Angeles. "There are fewer pairs of eyeballs watching the games. So advertisers are paying more and getting less."

The majority of the continental U.S. is served by two major regional cable sports providers.

The triumverate of Daniels & Associates Chairman Bill Daniels, Tele-Communications Inc. and entrepreneur and co-owner of the Houston Astros John McMullen created Prime Sports Network last June.

PSN claims to be carried in 9.2 million cable households, primarily in 18 states in the West and Southwest.

The other major player is Rainbow Program Enterprises, an NBC-Cablevision Systems Corp. partnership. Its SportsChannel America serves 6.3 million subscribers and covers such markets as Chicago, New York, New England and Florida.

After an industry shakeout in 1984 and 1985 for the entire cable industry, regional sports channels and networks are in a fairly solid position, according to Dontia Gould, editor of Cable Television Sports, an industry newsletter.

> "The sports fan's viewing audience has remained relatively flat."

But the easy pickings are over. All but two of the major U.S. sports centers are taken, she says.

"With the exception of Detroit and Washington, D.C., Rainbow/NBC or Daniels/TCI control the entire market," Ms. Gould says. "You don't see entrepreneurs going into secondary markets. And some networks that are outside the Top 10 markets may have a hard time with advertising."

Not everyone agrees sports TV is tapped out. John Mansell, senior analyst at Paul Kagan Associates, says the market is growing to accommodate new players, particularly those who bring something different to sports fans.

"Sports news is something people want at their fingertips," says SNN Exec VP Jon Steinlauf. "We're not going into this to pick out a niche, but to take sports out of simply live game coverage. I don't see too many other concepts out there that are going to affect programming."

SNN is being programmed as a 24-hour sports news network and will offer features, interviews and other sports news.

ESPN also feels sports cable is still developing, and that the addition of new choices benefits the existing networks and viewers.

"Competition can only benefit the viewer. We're trying to improve what people see and how much they see," says Chris LaPlaca, ESPN's director of communications. "You haven't seen the end of what's happening with sports."

ESPN research shows its viewers who subscribe to regional sports networks find ESPN more valuable than its viewers who do not pick up regional networks. He likens it to the strategic decisions in other media to carve out local, regional, national and international expertises.

Steve Sabol, president of NFL Films, says regional sports channels are "still in their formative years . . . But the sports fan is a very sophisticated audience. The fans respond to something different because they're being saturated with [event coverage]."

Donald Heller, VP-general manager of PRISM, a pay cable channel serving the Philadelphia area, says although advertising generates 25% to 30% of regional sports channels' revenue, there is still more to be tapped. He tempered that optimism by adding increased advertising will not be the pot of gold for unprofitable companies who pay astronomical fees for broadcast rights.

"A lot of people think the advertising market out there is unlimited; I don't," Mr. Heller says. "Ad dollars as a panacea is a fallacy because consumers are going to pay for it sooner or later." □

Cavett caveat: New set of rules

By Anita M. Busch

Substance over flash.

Dick Cavett, widely regarded as one of the most sophisticated talk-show hosts to grace the airwaves, is back with his own show on NBC cable channel CNBC.

With a TV career spanning more than 20 years, Mr. Cavett offers a unique perspective on the differences between cable and network TV.

"For the performer, there seems to be less of the kind of instant live or die pressure [on cable] that you have on the networks," he says.

But, Mr. Cavett adds, cable does have its problems. "One of the things you have to deal with is explaining to people why they don't get the show when their cousin six blocks away does."

Advertising and promotion of his show is handled differently because of cable's limited reach. "All the time I'm in cable, I think why not advertise and promote [the show]. However, it doesn't necessarily pay to [advertise] in all the Brooklyn papers where they don't have cable."

Now there are so many channels available because of cable, viewers "don't remember what channel they saw you on. It's not the old days when you couldn't forget that Ed Sullivan was on CBS. . . . It was CBS, wasn't it?"

He says he doesn't really watch much TV, cable or network.

"If I want to be amused and am not getting up early, Carson still makes me laugh so hard, so suddenly. And except for Candy Bergen [on "Murphy Brown"] and the "Golden Girls," I doubt if I can tell you what night anything else is on.

"I'm a sucker for any WWII documentary. Every time I switch A&E on and it's in the middle of one being narrated by Olivier or someone, I'm stuck until the end of that show," Mr. Cavett says.

Viewers are realizing that there is some good programming on cable and have read about the networks' fear of the medium, he says.

Getting guests on the CNBC show hasn't been a problem although Mr. Cavett admits, "One of my earliest fears was who's going to come to Fort Lee, New Jersey [where the show is taped]?

NBC/Al Levine

Dick Cavett: "One of my earliest fears was who's going to come to Fort Lee."

"I pictured it somewhere deep in the heart of the state. Ironically, I can get from home to the studio in Fort Lee easier than from my apartment to the theater district."

He says guests like the half-hour format on CNBC because it assures them that more than likely they'll be the only guest on that particular show. "There's certainly no stigma attached to cable [programming] anymore."

When cable programmers ask guests to appear on a show, now they don't receive the response, " 'I'm not going to leave my hotel room for a cable show,' " he says.

"[The medium has] gained status and people have read that almost everybody and everything has been on cable . . . I don't know, is there some historic date you could point to? Perhaps, like when Sinatra did a cable special and suddenly it became respectable?" □

Czech media eye more ad space

By Peter S. Green

PRAGUE—The expected opening of Czechoslovakia to the West may herald changes in media.

TV and radio commercial airtime may be extended and opened to foreign advertisers for the first time, and both magazines and newspapers may increase ad availability, industry insiders say.

"In two or three months' time, I think we will have Western goods on TV ads," said Miroslav Skopic, publicity manager for Rapid, a state-owned agency.

Czechoslovakia has 13 daily newspapers, hundreds of magazines and two TV channels. There's one national radio network and as many as two local stations in each market.

Local coverage of the protests has been closely watched by Czech citizens. Angry crowds gathered outside the government-controlled TV and radio stations to demand unbiased coverage of the movement.

At rallies in Wenceslas Square, opposition leaders addressed the crowd from the headquarters' balcony of Svobodne Slovo, the official Socialist Party daily. Thousands of chanting Czechs cheered Svobodne Slovo and cursed the main Communist Party paper, Rude Pravo.

Daily newspapers, which usually grew old on the newsstands, have been selling out by 7 a.m.

Czech media's growth has been stymied by tight government control, circulation problems and very low-quality printing and paper.

Currently, the ratio of newsprint limits newspaper pressruns, and newspapers carry very few ads, apart from classifieds.

Magazines carry the bulk of Czech advertising. But even the most popular magazines, such as general-interest Vlasta, run only a handful of ads.

But a shortage of paper means that a popular magazine such as Mlady Svet (Young World) has five readers per copy, claiming paid circulation of 475,000. A b&w page ad costs $4,700.

Jiri Cerny, VP-commercial director at Merkur, a full-service agency as well as the advertising arm of both Czech TV channels, predicted each copy of West German fashion magazine Burda Moden's Czech edition (AA, Dec. 4) will be read by 20 to 30 people.

"Next year, they will be reading this year's copies and using the dress patterns. Nobody will throw them out," he said.

The slow growth also stems from the lack of advertisers, industry sources say. "The media don't depend on advertising yet. They're sponsored by the state. But the situation is changing," Mr. Cerny said.

Czech TV also suffers from a lack of investment, he added. Manufacturers of Western goods or of quality Czech goods invest little in advertising.

"Whatever they put on sale is sold," he said.

Each national TV channel broadcasts about 8 hours a day and carries a total of 5 to 15 minutes daily of commercials from Czech marketers.

Advertising for foreign products is banned now, but this is expected to change under the new head of Czech TV, Miroslav Pavel, the Communist government's spokesman and a former journalist.

Radio also is opening up. Before the uprising, Merkur earlier this year had reached an agreement with Czech radio to triple the available ad time to 120 hours a year for the main radio station. □

Yugoslavia may follow Hungary to IAA membership

By Julie Skur Hill and Laurel Wentz

The International Advertising Association is developing an Eastern European accent.

At the New York-based organization's 32nd congress in Hamburg next June, Yugoslavia may join Hungary as the second official chapter in Eastern Europe, said IAA World President Clay Timon.

"Several individuals have come up to me at recent meetings from Yugoslavia, asking how they can become a chapter," said Mr. Timon, who's also VP-worldwide advertising at Colgate-Palmolive Co. "They need 15 members. . . . I think they'll get enough people interested."

The IAA also is "trying to encourage" the Soviet advertising association to upgrade its status as associate member to chapter, he said. In September, a group in Hungary became the IAA's first Eastern European chapter.

To teach IAA's Western members how to enter Eastern Europe, Hungarian IAA General Secretary Andras Szedgedi said he's trying to organize a conference next year in Budapest.

It would cover topics such as how to conquer the Soviet market through Hungary and offer advice from companies already operating in Eastern Europe, such as McDonald's Corp. and Adidas, said Mr. Szedgedi, who's also assistant to the managing director of Young & Rubicam Hungary.

Meanwhile, the IAA is trying to line up the economic ministers of the Soviet Union, Hungary, Yugoslavia, Poland and East Germany to attend the Hamburg congress.

The ministers would hold a group discussion titled "Comecon —a market with unlimited potential? An overview of the business revolution . . . in the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe."

"I think the Hungarian conference might have a problem at-

East Germans scout for good buys in West

By Kevin Cote

WEST BERLIN—On the ground floor of the Wertheim department store, three teen-age East German girls sprayed their wrists with Elida Gibbs' Impulse body spray.

"Oh, we've seen this advertised on Western TV," one said. "You can get this, or something like it, in East Germany, but it costs a fortune."

The girls said they recognized many popular western brands, such as Benetton, Adidas and Levi's, but based their buying decisions on price. "We go for the cheapest," one young teen said.

This problem—that many East Germans want to buy brand name products but end up buying at the low end—is undercutting West German retailers' high expectations for the holiday season.

While crowds line up before opening hours to get into Woolworth Corp., where sales reportedly were up 300% soon after the Berlin Wall opened up, "the retail situation is nowhere near as positive as most people would expect," said Klaus Engelen, group sales director of three West Berlin upscale department store chains —Wertheim, Hertie and Bilka.

Overall sales at Wertheim stores are about the same as those during last year's holiday period because brisk sales of low-profit-margin items such as mass-market cosmetics, Unilever's Lux soap, Henkel's FA bath products and Beiersdorf's Nivea lotions, are offsetting losses of up to 20% in high-margin departments such as women's fashions, he said.

Wertheim's experience is typical of many West German department stores. Usual store traffic for Wertheim on the Kurfurstendamm, the tony shopping district here, is about 30,000 shoppers a day, Mr. Engelen said.

Since Nov. 9, the day travel restrictions were lifted, the average has been closer to 100,000.

However, that enormous increase in traffic hasn't automatically added up to profits. "Flat sales, higher costs and theft rates that have gone through the roof. . . . altogether, we're anticipating losses this season," he said.

Personnel costs have soared as stores expanded shopping hours.

Most East Germans are financing their shopping sprees from the $56 "welcome money" given by the West German government.

"But it's not that much money," said a father from Leipzig, guiding his family away from a perfume and digital watch vendor on the Kurfurstendamm.

He said he's saving to buy a decent stop-cock for his toilet back home.

"The one we have breaks down all the time," he said.

While branded jeans such as Levi's and Wrangler weren't moving at the Steg Shop jeans store, the manager reported good sales of no-name dungarees at half the price of branded trousers.

Cosmetics, personal-care items, all types of low-cost audio equipment, including personal stereos, and automotive accessories top East Germans' shopping lists. Other products said to be selling well are radio-controlled and battery-operated toys.

Such buying decisions by East Germany's 16 million consumers are being carefully watched.

A.C. Nielsen Co. is working on a research project to determine the buying patterns of East Germans who've been shopping in towns all along the border between East and West Germany.

"We want to find out how much they are buying, what they are buying and where they are buying it," said Karl-Joerg Kornobis, Nielsen deputy director of customer services.

"A lot of companies are burning for information out of East Germany," he said. □

Agencies cross wall to find comrades

PRAGUE—The leading Czech ad agencies are seeking relationships with Western agency groups. Merkur, an agency and the ad arm for both Czechoslovakian TV stations, and Rapid, a state-owned agency connected to the Ministry of Industry, have been in discussions with Western advertisers and agencies for the past year, sources say.

Merkur has met with J. Walter Thompson Co. executives from Vienna and with Young & Rubicam, said Jiri Cerny, Merkur VP-commercial director. However, the agency is more interested in working with European—especially West German—agencies.

Also, several Rapid executives are seeking to establish their own agencies early in 1990 and are starting to look for ties to Western agencies, sources say.

NUREMBERG—GfK, a market research company based here, wants to open an office in East Germany but is having trouble finding the right people to talk to.

"We're in contact with East Berlin, but nothing so far," said GfK Managing Director Hans Juergen Anders. In August, GfK set up a subsidiary in Hungary and will use that as a base to expand into East Germany, he said.

BRIEFS

MOSCOW—A sign of the changing times was posted Nov. 29 when Coca-Cola Co. lit a red, 20-by-40-foot neon Coca-Cola sign in Pushkin Square.

The sign features the Coca-Cola trademark in a moving display that includes the time and current temperature.

WEST BERLIN—Flaskamp agency here hopes to establish an office on the other side of the crumbling Wall.

The agency has had discussions with a design company in Dresden for the past three years but is now looking closer to home at an office in East Berlin.

FRANKFURT—Dieter Schweickhardt, managing director of GWA, a West German ad agency association based here, has written East Germany's advertising organization Interwerbung in East Berlin in an effort to re-establish ties.

He said in an interview the agencies his association represents are willing to expand offices into the East.

"Only we don't know what form it will take because it still is not clear how businesses will be structured in [East Germany]," he said. "The first step is to say, 'Let's talk.' " □ tracting the same people," Mr. Timon said. "My point is let the world congress have the general Eastern Europe information, and the Hungarian conference can handle specialized information."

A few hundred people are expected to attend the Hungarian conference while 1,000 to 2,000 are expected at the Hamburg congress themed "Changes," he said.

"The world is changing faster than ever before; environmental protection, megamergers, glasnost have influenced the world and the economy," said Joerg A. Breckwoldt, chairman of the congress and managing partner of cosmetics marketer Dralle, Hamburg.

Many of the proposed speakers for the Hamburg congress have accepted. They include Philip H. Geier Jr., chairman-ceo, Interpublic Group of Cos.; Helmut Sihler, ceo, Henkel; Allen Rosenshine, chairman-ceo, BBDO Worldwide; and Michael Conrad, president-director of creative services, Leo Burnett International. Newsweek will send journalists from four continents for a discussion on media concentration.

The fee for the three-day congress is $750 for IAA members; non-members pay $900. □

Chrysler's troubles mount

Emilio Azcarraga: The mystery man behind 'National'

'El Tigre' launches sports daily

By Christy Fisher

He could be the new media baron of the 1990s, in the same league as Rupert Murdoch. He's already that in Mexico, where many people believe he's the second most powerful man, next to the president.

Few people know him well, but those who do fear him.

Emilio Azcarraga Milmo—or "El Tigre" (The Tiger) as he is called in Mexico—is about to hit the U.S. in a major way by undertaking the biggest media risk of the new year: the launch of a national U.S. sports daily, The National, slated for January.

If successful, the National could catapult El Tigre into a prominent position in U.S. print media.

It also would lay the groundwork for other ambitious plans the Mexican has for the U.S. market.

Whatever happens, the U.S. has not seen the likes of this kind of media baron since the eccentricities of William Randolph Hearst. The way Mr. Azcarraga came to finance the National illustrates the point.

Shortly after meeting at a New York dinner party, Peter Price, then publisher of the New York Post, and Mr. Azcarraga became absorbed in conversation about media and sports.

Mr. Azcarraga wondered why the U.S. didn't have a national sports daily, and he then suggested that he and Mr. Price put one together.

Though interested, Mr. Price said he still had a six-month commitment to the Post.

Six months later, Mr. Price received a telephone call from Mr. Azcarraga. "Six months are up, and it's time," he said.

Now the National, which will be published Sunday through Friday, has become the most-anticipated new launch since that of USA Today (its main competitor, many believe).

The National will cost an estimated $100 million to launch. It has an editorial staff of 25, led by Editor Frank Deford, a veteran of Sports Illustrated, and will cost 50¢ a copy.

Initially, the paper will be in New York, Chicago and Los Angeles. The plan is for it to spread to one market a month and in five years to be in more than 100 markets with a 1 million circulation.

As for the man behind it, few people know anything about him.

In Mexico, many believe Mr. Azcarraga's secrecy is based on fears of terrorists and kidnappers. He declined to be interviewed for

A crisis mentality is back at Chrysler Corp., and that state of mind may carry both perils and opportunities for the company's ad agencies.

The No. 3 automaker on Friday announced a major new consumer incentives program that includes for the first time its popular minivans, a line critical to Chrysler's profitability.

Slumping sales and bleak forecasts drove the move to offer cash-back incentives of $1,000 to $2,000 on every Chrysler vehicle. There also is an innovative guarantee that buyers can get cash back if incentives are sweetened after this program expires Jan. 31.

Chairman Lee Iacocca explained the program in a highly unusual state-of-the-company address carried via closed circuit TV to dealers across the country.

Mr. Iacocca also gave the dealers reassurance that Chrysler is committed to the North American car business, and said the company is keeping its future product plans on schedule despite the tough times.

On the agency side, no one has suggested Mr.

Chrysler is demanding more from agencies, and strategic assignments are taking new turns.

Iacocca is considering the type of dramatic action he took 10 years ago, when Chrysler faced even deeper financial problems than it does now.

At that time, he fired all Chrysler's agencies and hired Kenyon & Eckhardt (now Bozell) away from Ford Motor Co.

But a sense of urgency about reviving the company's fortunes is unmistakable. As Chrysler struggles, the company is demanding more from agencies, and strategic assignments are taking new turns.

Last week Chrysler called in three of its agencies—Bozell, BBDO Worldwide and Campbell-Mithun-Esty—to present ideas for the incentives campaign, an assignment that in the past would have automatically gone to corporate agency Bozell.

In the end, Chrysler assigned the new campaign to Bozell, but the work is based on "ideas from all three agencies," said A.C. "Bud" Liebler, Chrysler executive director-corporate communications and marketing services. That lends support to the view that the estimated $20 million corporate account is in play (AA, Nov. 13).

"I wouldn't be surprised if there were more creative jump balls," said one Chrysler agency source.

Stroh mulls cuts as Coors deal dies

DETROIT—Major ad cutbacks could be in store for Stroh Brewery in the wake of last week's failure to complete a deal with Adolph Coors Co.

Coors backed out of the $425 million deal Dec. 15, saying it couldn't resolve "significant issues" and anti-trust concerns in a timely manner.

Brewing division President Peter Coors said negotiations would continue, but Stroh has the option of looking for other buyers. Among other brewers mentioned as possible buyers are Guinness PLC, a Belgian brewer and S&P Corp., marketer of Pabst and Pearl beers.

Sources said if the deal can't be resuscitated or another suitor found quickly, Stroh might have to think about cutting back Stroh's and Stroh's Light from national to regional support or major across-the-board cutbacks in its onetime $40 million advertising account. Hal Riney & Partners, San Francisco, handles Stroh's and Stroh's Light. Grey Advertising, New York, handles Old Milwaukee.

"We would expect to continue to support Schlitz Malt Liquor and Old Milwaukee at historic levels," said Christopher Sortwell, Stroh VP-corporate planning and development. "The ques-

Cabinet execs back limits on alcohol ads

By Steven W. Colford

WASHINGTON—In what may be an omen for alcoholic-beverage marketers, two members of President Bush's Cabinet last week said alcohol advertising and promotional practices should be more closely regulated or banned by the federal government.

The controversial statements by Transportation Secretary Samuel Skinner and Health & Human Services Secretary Louis Sullivan were sandwiched around a 10-minute speech by President Bush before about 180 representatives of anti-alcohol and drunken driving groups.

Stephen Hart, White House deputy assistant press secretary, said the two Cabinet officers were expressing their own views and not those of President Bush. There was no discussion within the White House to review alcoholic beverage advertising, but the subject could easily be brought to the president's attention by the department heads, Mr. Hart said.

"Both Skinner and Sullivan could bring this to the Domestic Policy Council, and that appears to be under consideration at both these agencies," Mr. Hart said. "It's an obvious concern of two key cabinet heads."

The issue arose when Mr. Skinner, after dismissing a suggestion of raising alcohol excise taxes, agreed stricter regulation of alcohol advertising might be needed.

"This whole issue of regulated advertising is something the federal government has traditionally looked at and stayed away from," Mr. Skinner said. "I'm not sure that it's not time to revisit those issues."

But it was Mr. Sullivan, following the president's brief appearance, who turned the 90-minute White House meeting into a dialog on alcohol advertising and promotion.

"We should consider some

S. Skinner

form of restraint on the advertising of alcoholic beverages," he said. "Radio and TV station managers must give alcohol advertisers less leeway. We can no longer allow impressionable young people to see the use of alcohol promoted as the essential ingredient in every social gathering or to have alcohol affiliated with rock concerts or other events that attract our teen-agers. It's time we have advertising that celebrated sobriety."

And when Ava Troxler, from the Winston-Salem, N.C., chapter of Remove Intoxicated Drivers, said the government could remove alcohol advertising from TV and radio as it did cigarette advertising, Mr. Sullivan enthusiastically agreed.

"We certainly will work to influence that significantly," he said. "The sentiment you express I fully support and will encourage."

The comments represent Mr. Sullivan's personal and departmental views, said Bob Schmermund, HHS deputy assistant secretary for public affairs.

"He has said in the past that we need to look into alcohol advertising," Mr. Schmermund said. "But I know of no specific plans or legislation in that regard."

But it appears quite possible, if not likely, that legislation restricting certain alcohol marketing practices may be forthcoming early in 1990. By Jan. 15, Mr. Sullivan, to comply with federal law, must deliver to Congress a report on alcohol and alcohol abuse, including legislative recommendations.

Based on his remarks at the White House, which reiterated proposals by former Surgeon General C. Everett Koop's drunken driving workshop of a year ago, Mr. Sullivan's report may well propose banning specific alcohol marketing techniques.

Those could include the use of celebrities in alcohol promotions, the sponsoring or promoting of concerts and sporting events where the audience is largely below drinking age, and alcohol ads that portray activities such as race-car driving and other risky pastimes.

Those recommendations, in turn, could find their way into legislation widely anticipated from Sen. John Glenn (D., Ohio), who attended last week's White House session and whose Senate Governmental Affairs Committee earlier this year probed alcohol advertising practices. □

Sears loses Disney, Tiegs

By David Snyder
Crain News Service

CHICAGO—Sears, Roebuck & Co. has lost its grip on one of its most promising promotional opportunities: a comprehensive, 10-year marketing pact with Walt Disney Co., signed with much fanfare in November 1987.

Under terms of the deal, viewed as an in-store marketing bonanza, Sears would have obtained exclusive rights to develop products using characters from classic and upcoming Disney animated films, and the ability to market a line of Disney children's apparel.

But terms of the agreement have been dramatically curtailed, leaving Sears with little more than the rights to sell new Disney merchandise on a case-by-case basis. (Sears maintains exclusive rights until 1991 to more than 250 characters from classic movies, such as "Peter Pan" and "Snow White.")

"We found the terms of the deal restrictive," a Disney spokesman said. "Now Sears has the opportunity to work with other film companies, and we have the right to work with other retailers."

C. Tiegs

Sears said a full-fledged alliance with Disney no longer fits its "power format" strategy.

Observers say the decision to call off the Disney alliance is unfortunate. Disney's powerful draw was seen as an effective way to attract customers.

"Without some promotion, the stores have the excitement of a dial tone," said one former Sears executive.

Sears also said the retailer and model Cheryl Tiegs are going their separate ways after a 10-year relationship.

The company's exclusive endorsement and apparel contract with Ms. Tiegs expires at yearend and won't be renewed.

Both Sears and Ms. Tiegs, 42, said the decision not to continue their affiliation was mutual.

Sears said the move is part of a strategy to shift to more brand-name merchandise in women's apparel. However, where it does market private-label items, Sears wants the label to be its own rather than one piggybacked on the reputation of a celebrity.

Affiliations with golfer Arnold Palmer and actress Stephanie Powers will continue, at least until their contracts expire.

Ms. Tiegs said Sears' marketing support for her sportswear line has declined steadily in recent years, culminating in a decision this year to exclude her from the catalog.

"It's not a positive, beneficial working relationship anymore," Ms. Tiegs said in an interview.

Terms of her contract weren't disclosed, but it's believed she received a fee plus percentage of sales. □

An Advertising Age roundup

U.S. advertisers have made a New Year's resolution to increase ad expenditures as much as 6% to 10% next year, a more bullish outlook than previously indicated.

Although industry guru Robert Coen, a McCann-Erickson Worldwide senior VP, said he believes 1990 will "be a better year than 1989 but certainly not a boom year," an informal Advertising Age survey found marketers may be more inclined to loosen their purse strings.

Mr. Coen, whose annual projections are taken as gospel by most advertisers and agencies, last week predicted spending next year will climb a modest 6.2% to $132.6 billion. His forecast came at the annual PaineWebber media outlook conference (see story on Page 41).

Despite fears the U.S. economy may plunge into recession by late 1990, industry executives predict ad spending in the automobile industry, fueled by several car introductions including General Motors Corp.'s Saturn, will increase an average of 13%.

"We're seeing people commit to building brand identities and keeping their budgets up. We're not seeing people jump into short-term measures."

Ad spending behind computers, where competition in the portable computer category remains fierce, will grow 11%, industry executives said.

"There are real wars about to break out in the PC and laptop segments, and I expect to see a number of new-product introductions," said Mark Minkin, director of corporate advertising at Bull, a computer marketer.

In consumer non-durables, such as soft drinks, food and over-the-counter drugs, executives said ad spending will climb about 8%. Spending behind cosmetics and fragrances and toiletries should average 7% growth, while household cleaners may show slightly more than 6% growth.

"We tend to be more bullish than others about the potential for media spending in the U.S.," said Martin Sorrell, chief executive of London-based WPP Group, which owns J. Walter Thompson Co. and Ogilvy & Mather Worldwide.

In his speech at the conference,

Hall of Fame lauds industry pioneers

By Steven W. Colford

For Jean Wade Rindlaub, last week's election to the Advertising Hall of Fame represented the capstone to a copywriting career that began when Herbert Hoover was president, TV an experiment and the Saatchi brothers not yet born.

Ms. Rindlaub, 85, who retired as a BBDO VP in 1964, is one of three 1989 electees to the industry pantheon, joining James Burke, former chairman-ceo of Johnson & Johnson, and Raymond Mithun, founder of Campbell-Mithun-Esty.

They will be inducted March 22 in ceremonies at New York's Waldorf-Astoria.

The three survived an original roster of 40 nominees, and will join 109 people already enshrined in the Hall of Fame, administered by the American Advertising Federation.

Mr. Burke, for 12 years the top man at Johnson & Johnson and a moving force behind its growth into a $9 billion global marketer, remains a key industry representative, presently serving as chairman of the Media-Advertising Partnership for a Drug-Free America.

Tyson's Looney about kids

New meals stress nutrition, convenience, fun

By Christy Fisher

Tyson Foods is teaming up with Bugs Bunny and the rest of the Looney Tunes gang to introduce a line of microwaveable low-fat frozen meals for children.

Tyson Looney Tunes Meals should be in much of the U.S., excluding the Northeast, by April. Rollout in the Northeast begins in October.

Each item in the eight-entree line features a different character, including Bugs, Daffy Duck, Speedy Gonzales, Road Runner, Sylvester, Tweety, Wile E. Coyote and Yosemite Sam.

A $10 million ad campaign breaks in May, including a 30-second animated network TV spot aimed at kids. Print ads targeted at parents focus on the meals' low-fat content, nutritional value and convenience.

Stern Walters Partners, Chicago, is handling; Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising, New York, remains Tyson's agency of record.

Tyson is the latest player in the emerging children's prepared-meals category, which the company estimates is worth a potential $250 million.

My Own Meals has a shelf-stable line in Midwestern markets, and ConAgra has plans for a national rollout early next year of its Kid Cuisine, a line of eight frozen dinners marketed under the Banquet brand.

Daffy Duck and seven other Looney Tunes characters are featured on Tyson's new line of meals for kids.

Geo. A. Hormel & Co. for the past year has been testing its Kid's Kitchen line of shelf-stable entrees, and Great American Food Co. is said to be testing a line called Kids' Cupboard, to be introduced within the next six months.

Tyson sought the affiliation with Warner Bros.' Looney Tunes characters because it wanted to make the meals fun and appeal to kids, said Jack Dunn, Tyson's VP-retail marketing.

Besides the characters on the box, each meal will be packaged with a Looney Tunes-related premium, he said, such as character collector cards.

Tyson thinks the meals also will have a nostalgic appeal to parents.

"Bugs Bunny is 50 years old," Mr. Dunn said. "You grew up with him. I grew up with him. Bugs Bunny is still the No. 1 character on Saturday morning cartoons." □

Pentagon to cut ad ammunition?

By Janet Meyers

WASHINGTON—The end of the Cold War may also mean the end of "Be all you can be," "Aim high" and "A few good men."

As the White House slashes defense spending with military threats from Eastern Europe waning, military recruitment advertising will likely suffer similar reductions, Pentagon officials predict.

The size of those cuts is still in question. But the Army, which now barely reaches its recruitment goals, fears Pentagon decision-makers will slash advertising so severely the Army won't be able to get its message out to potential recruits.

For 1990, the Defense Department will spend about $185 million on recruitment advertising, a 5% drop from 1989. The cuts in 1991 will be steeper, military officials say.

"Candidly, I wouldn't be surprised" to see a dramatic cut in the 1991 ad budget, said Lt. Col. Dave Fredrikson, assistant director, Defense Office of Accession Policy. He estimated the ad budget cut will equal the percentage reduction in military personnel.

"I would just assume everything in the defense budget would be smaller," said John Glorieux, exec VP-general manager, Young & Rubicam, New York, which handles the Army's $91 million account. The Army "is an account we value," even if its dollar amount drops over the next several years, he said.

Decisions on how advertising will be affected by the major policy shifts now under discussion by the Pentagon and Congre are several months away.

"When you're talking about canceling B-1s, our priority

Sustained growth hinging on TV project

By Christy Fisher

Pity the Hispanic media and advertising agencies. Having a decade named after your market segment makes for a tough act to follow.

But advertiser and agency executives predict 1990 will continue the growth pattern established in the 1980s, the so-called "Decade of the Hispanic."

The growth will partly depend on a project in Los Angeles to better measure Hispanic TV audiences. The results of a Univision Network and Telemundo Group-commissioned Nielsen Media Research people-meter test will indicate the near-term validity of the Hispanic media and advertising market.

"It all depends on what happens with the Nielsen research," said Castor Fernandez, chairman-creative director of Castor GS&B Advertising, New York. "If the [audience share] numbers come through, the impact will be significant."

"Now, we get less than 1% of the [advertising] dollars for what we believe is 5% or 6% of [all TV] viewers," said Henry Silverman, president-ceo of Telemundo. "If we confirm those numbers, we'll get a greater share."

The second most significant event to affect the Hispanic market in the next decade will be the 1990 U.S. census.

In 1988, the census reported Hispanics constituted 8.1% of the U.S. population—a figure that is expected to grow to 9% by 1990 and to 11.1% by 2000.

The 1980 census made people sit up and take note of the Hispanic market; the 1990 Census will show companies that the market can't be ignored, said Herney Nisimblat, Colgate-Palmolive's Hispanic marketing director.

Those population projections, coupled with favorable Nielsen results, could have a tremendous impact on Hispanic TV alone, which makes up about 41% of the $584 million in media advertising now spent on the Hispanic market.

"We could see significant double-digit growth of 20%, 30%, 40% or 50% in 10 years," Mr. Silverman said. "It almost sounds ridiculous. But, by 2000, [overall] projected TV revenues are expected to hit $60 billion. If Hispanics make up 20% of the population and half watch Hispanic TV, we could be looking at $6 billion in revenue, up from $300 million now."

While growth in the 1980s was fueled by new players entering the market, much expansion in the 1990s will come from existing companies that are becoming increasingly sophisticated in their approach to the market, sources said.

Sales promotion will see much growth in the 1990s, advertisers said, as well as direct mail and PR. Also, TV and radio productions are becoming more elaborate.

"The promotion business really flourished in 1989 and that should continue into the 1990s," said Dick Tobin, president-ceo of Strategy Research Corp., Miami.

Some predict a third TV network will emerge and others expect to see growth in print media dollars.

A growing list of media options should stimulate Hispanic ad budgets. "Due to the growth in Hispanic media, we're growing accordingly," said Hernand Gonzalez, national manager-Hispanic marketing, Pepsi-Cola Co. "An advertiser can't get by with just one or two commercials anymore."

A number of events in the next decade also should put the spotlight on Hispanics: the 500th anniversary of Christopher Columbus' voyage; the 1994 Olympics in Barcelona, Spain; and the World Cup, which will be held in the U.S. in 1994.

"These should create a lot of good will toward Hispanics," said Carl Kravetz, president, Ferrer/-Ad America.

Mr. Silverman added one caveat to the bright projections.

"This outlook is tempered with the projection that the economy stays as it is now," he said. "If there is a downturn, ad budgets are the first thing to be cut and the first type of advertising to be cut and the last to be added are efforts geared toward specific market segments." □

Lotto interest: California Lottery Commission expects to announce finalists Jan. 17 and a tentative winner Feb. 2 for its Hispanic ad account, billing about $7 million to $9 million annually over four years (AA, Dec. 4). Attending a mandatory bidders' conference were incumbent Casanova Pendrill Publicidad; Castor GS&B Advertising; Cavazos & Associates; Font & Vaamonde Associates; Hispanic America; Mendoza Dillon & Asociados; Yolanda Mendoza; Sanchez & Levitan. Those attending will not necessarily make a bid. Susan Clark, the lottery's marketing director, said the lottery is "very pleased" with Casanova's performance, but is required by law to put the contract up for bid.

Bermudez clicks: Polaroid Corp. has named Bermudez Associates Hispanic agency for its estimated $1.5 million account. Bermudez also picked up promotional project work from Eveready Battery Co. for the Miami and Los Angeles markets.

Roundup: Nationwide Foods named Valdes Zacky Associates its first Hispanic agency to market traditional Mexican candies in southern California. McDonald's co-ops in Phoenix, Tucson and Yuma/El Centro, Ariz., have named Ferrer/Ad America. Ferrer now handles all co-op advertising in Arizona and California.

Count on it

Census efforts adding up

By Christy Fisher

By the time 1990 census forms are mailed on March 23, Hispanics should be well aware of the importance of standing up and being counted.

A flurry of ad campaigns promoting the census begins next month. A U.S. Census Bureau effort targeting Hispanics will be supplemented by ads from marketers, Hispanic civic and business organizations and the Hispanic media.

The aggressiveness of some campaigns underscores what's at stake: more political power. Hispanic media and agencies are interested in pushing participation to bolster advertiser interest in the market.

The 1990 census is expected to show a 34.5% increase in U.S. Hispanic population vs. 1980 figures. "It is the most important event to impact the Hispanic community well into the next century," said Jose Bermea, deputy chief-Hispanic media at the U.S. Census Bureau promotion office.

The campaign will attempt to correct a problem of undercounting. In 1980, the bureau estimates the undercount was 5% to 7%; others estimate it to be higher.

To get the most accurate count, the Census Bureau will break TV, radio and print promoting the importance of the census. The pro bono effort from the Ad Council and Castor GS&B is themed, "Esta es la nuestra; participe en el censo" ("This is our chance; participate in the census").

Three TV spots will be tailored to Mexicans, Puerto Ricans and Cubans. A fourth will be aimed at English-dominant Hispanics, Mr. Bermea said.

Univision urges viewers to make themselves count in spots supporting the upcoming census.

Twenty-five Hispanic organizations have endorsed the census project and many, such as the Mexican-American Legal Defense & Educational Fund, the National Association of Latino Elected Officials and U.S. Hispanic Chamber of Commerce, have created their own census-oriented campaigns.

MALDEF has teamed up with Univision Network for its "Hagase Contar" or "Make Yourself Count" campaign. Also the National Association of Latino Elected Officials, in cooperation with Telemundo Network, soon will break a TV campaign featuring Hispanic politicians. □

People-meter changes proposed

By Wayne Walley

NEW YORK—The controversy surrounding people meters resurfaced last week, despite nationwide acceptance of the technology by advertisers, agencies and the TV industry.

This time, ABC, CBS, NBC and the National Association of Broadcasters say the issue is Nielsen Media Research's measurement techniques, not the measurement tool itself.

Their assessment, based on a 22-month, 600-page study of people meters released last week, questions the methods of selecting primary and alternate Nielsen families; the fatigue factor associated with punching people-meter buttons for more than a year; the ability of children and visitors to use the system; and the lack of a way to measure viewing outside the household.

"Television circa 1990 is different vs. the late 1940s and early 1950s when the techniques were established," said Alan Wurtzel, ABC's senior VP-marketing and research services. "Measurement must reflect today's viewing patterns within the home and more."

Some observers, including Arbitron Co., believe passive people meters might help solve some of the problems.

Passive meters record a viewer's presence without any effort by the person, unlike people meters in use today that require viewers to push buttons when they enter or leave the room.

Arbitron said last week it would begin installing passive people meters as early as 1991 to help achieve an "ideal" method of research and will buy 40,000 passive meters from French research company Telemetric.

Nielsen Media Research also hopes to have passive people meters in place by 1992 and entered into an agreement with the David Sarnoff Research Center last June to develop the necessary hardware.

But David Poltrack, senior VP-planning and research, CBS Broadcast Group, said passive people meters won't necessarily solve the problems uncovered by the $1 million Statistical Research Inc. report commissioned by the Big 3 networks/NAB Committee On Nationwide Television Audience Measurement.

"We can't clearly say a passive people meter is the ideal today. The issues go beyond that. You don't automatically assume not pushing buttons will increase participation," Mr. Poltrack said.

Among the issues explored by the report:

- Cooperation rate. In recent years, the rate of refusal to participate in all forms of survey research has increased. "Unquestionably, this is the biggest challenge because less than 50% of the [initial] designated sample is participating," Mr. Poltrack said.
- Metering of all sets. Nielsen's policy evolved to exclude certain classes of sets including those smaller than 5 inches, sets in boarder's quarters and those in detached buildings.
- Fatigue. The study showed a decline in reported viewing among those who have been in the panel longer. The committee suggested cutting the two-year turnover period in half.
- Children's and visitor's measurement. The procedure for children and visitors to log in to the people meter should be simplified to assure compliance, the study said.

The report also recommended that Nielsen establish a new group or an ombudsman to be responsible for quality control.

"The objective is to get the measurement right, not to get higher network ratings," said Barry Cook, chairman of the committee and VP-media research at NBC. "The changes needed will capture viewing that is not measured."

Mr. Cook said the introduction of the people meter in 1987 triggered the study, a comprehensive and unprecedented look at Nielsen's measurement techniques.

John Dimling, Nielsen's exec VP-group director of marketing, said Nielsen is already at work implementing some of the report's suggestions. Other recommendations, he said, require a great deal of work and could be scrapped because of cost. □

Mr. Sorrell projected 10% "organic" growth from existing accounts, an optimistic outlook that stems from the presence of big-spending package-goods marketers on WPP client rosters.

"Package-goods companies are concentrating on increasing share rather than remaining the low-cost producer as they had been for the last few years," he said.

Bruce Crawford, chairman-ceo of Omnicom Group, said: "We're seeing people commit to building brand identities and keeping their budgets up. We're not seeing people jump into short-term measures."

Now that many companies are competing in mature categories filled with parity products, media ad spending is becoming more important.

"Ad spending in 1990 in our industries will average 5% to 7%" growth, said Clay Timon, VP-worldwide advertising, Colgate-Palmolive Co. "What we'd all like to do is carve back promotional spending and add those additional dollars to consumer media."

Mr. Timon said trade promotions still account for up to 65% of all marketing expenditures, and for "a good deal more" than the $450 million Colgate will spend on advertising in 1990.

Yet Mr. Timon and other industry executives said the tide is turning from heavy promotional spending, and that those dollars are being reinvested in consumer advertising.

"There's a little bit more stability in the advertising business, with not as much money being siphoned off into sales promotion," said Roy Bostock, president of D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles, New York. "That trend is abating."

"Our clients on average are increasing ad spending 10% next year," said Gary Stibel, principal of the New England Consulting Group, a package-goods consultancy. "They've found they need to reinvest more significantly in advertising to grow brand share."

Frito-Lay, the PepsiCo snackfoods division, plans to boost ad spending 50% to $90 million (see story on Page 18). Perhaps more significantly, the increase isn't at the expense of the company's promotional budget, which will remain about even with 1989 spending, the company said.

While Frito-Lay, the No. 1 salty-snack marketer, may roll out some new products in 1990, most of the budget will back its five core brands. Main agencies are DDB Needham Worldwide, Chicago, and Tracy-Locke, Dallas.

"There's a little bit more stability in the advertising business, with not as much money being siphoned off into sales promotion."

L.A. Gear plans a 140% increase in ad spending to $60 million next year, primarily to fund its most extensive marketing campaign to date in support of a new line of shoes and apparel designed and endorsed by Michael Jackson.

The campaign, handled in-house, will mark L.A. Gear's first venture into network TV. Vitt Media International, Los Angeles, buys media.

US Sprint, the No. 3 telephone marketer, will spend 15% to 20% more on advertising in 1990, said George Rodriguez, VP-advertising and direct marketing. He estimated Sprint's overall ad budget will total between $140 million and $150 million, with $80 million to be spent on TV and print alone, including Sprint's first ad in several years during the Super Bowl.

J. Walter Thompson USA, San Francisco, handles.

Spending "varies with each category and client, but growth opportunities are spurring our clients to increase budgets," said Norman Brown, chairman-ceo, Foote, Cone & Belding Communications, Chicago. "Marketers can't afford to blow out advertising and still maintain share."

"It looks quite a bit like '89 to me," said Keith Reinhard, chairman-ceo, DDB Needham Worldwide, New York. "Some categories are down and some countries are soft. Overall, we'll see the same kind of increases, slow and steady as we did in '89. In the U.S., [the increase] will be around 7%; it was a little better this year, but we expect international to be better next year."

Increased competitive pressures likely will give another boost to automotive ad spending, which has risen at least 15% annually for each of the last five years (AA, Oct. 30). But if the lackluster market for car and truck sales continues for several more months, it could temper industry executives' predictions.

"There's bound to be talk of cutting back if sales don't pick up," said one GM agency executive. "But I think most people will be reluctant to take the chance on giving up any market share."

The National Restaurant Association predicts a 6.2% sales increase for restaurants.

Ad spending in the fast-food category could be slightly higher; the restaurant association projects a 7.4% increase next year there, compared with a 5.4% gain for full-service restaurants.

However, more fast-food marketing dollars are expected to flow out of media into promotion.

Food marketers in 1990 will watch the bottom line more carefully than in years past. Increasing commodity prices, the end of benefits from tax reform and a slowdown in mergermania have given food companies less leeway to increase prices and more pressure to keep shareholders happy—and consequently less room to spend with abandon.

Average spending increases are expected to hover closer to sales increases than in past years—meaning closer to 8% to 10% than 15% to 20%—as companies like Quaker Oats Co. and Campbell Soup Co. try to keep profit margins up.

As a result, food marketers' spending is likely to be more focused than ever on key brands and categories, and important new products.

ConAgra Consumer Frozen Food Co., with three new brands on its shelf—Healthy Choice, Kid Cuisine and Zap—will continue to "spend aggressively, on new brands in particular in 1990," said Steve Hughes, VP-marketing for new products. "We have some pretty exciting and significant brand equities we're trying to establish, and are working with pretty good momentum."

ConAgra's three new lines face competitive ad activity in emerging categories. ConAgra will continue its $12 million TV and print campaign for Healthy Choice frozen dinners as it adds entrees to the low-fat, low-cholesterol, low-sodium line.

With Stouffer Foods Corp.'s Right Course just completing national distribution with a $10 million ad commitment, and Campbell Soup USA pushing its Le Menu LightStyle, promotional and ad activity should be strong in the growing health-oriented meals segment throughout 1990.

Campbell said it still plans to hike marketing spending 15% in fiscal 1990 ending July 31 despite recent turmoil in the company.

"There's bound to be talk of cutting back if sales don't pick up. But I think most people will be reluctant to take the chance on giving up any market share."

Campbell CEO R. Gordon McGovern left abruptly in November, leaving two company executives jockeying for the top slot.

Much of the spending increase will back Campbell's condensed soups. Rival Pet Inc.'s Progresso plans to double ad spending to $15 million.

Ad spending at Pillsbury Foods should be up about 60% as new owner Grand Metropolitan attacks undersupported brands, said Pillsbury Chief Operating Officer Paul Walsh.

Pillsbury kicked off its big push at the beginning of its fiscal year in October, when it broke a $30 million campaign for refrigerated doughs and dessert mixes. That was followed by new executions of Green Giant's Jolly Green Giant and Sprout campaign.

Ad spending behind OTC pharmaceuticals is likely to increase 8% in 1990, keeping pace with sales growth in the industry.

Although 1989 figures aren't yet available, the industry spent $1.2 billion in 1988 for OTC drug advertising, an increase of 10.6% over 1987 spending, said James Callandrillo, project manager for Kline & Co., a consultancy.

Major spending hikes are anticipated in the early 1990s as more prescription drugs are converted to OTC status. Prescription drugs seeking OTC status cover a myriad of categories, from antacids and smoking cessation to baldness treatments and new cough-cold remedies.

Retail advertising is expected to show the smallest gain, only about 5%.

Davis, Ball & Colombatto, Los Angeles, which specializes in retail accounts, expects spending will rise no more than 8%.

"Generally, they know it's going to be tough to get business in 1990," said President Brad A. Ball.

Joseph Antonini, chairman-ceo of K mart Corp., said that retailer's budget will be "about the same" as 1989, estimated at $605 million. "It could even be a little less," he said. "We're going to take a hard look at all the ways we do things to make our advertising more effective."

Sears, Roebuck & Co., the nation's largest retailer, doesn't plan to raise its ad budget significantly in 1990; instead, Sears will direct more of its ad dollars into TV and less into print, especially run-of-press newspaper ads. □

FTC investigates degradability claims

By Jennifer Lawrence

The Federal Trade Commission's consumer protection bureau is probing environmental ad claims made by marketers that promote degradability aspects of their products.

An FTC senior staffer confirmed "investigations are under way," but FTC policy prohibits naming the companies.

Advertising Age has learned that among those under scrutiny are First Brands Corp. for Glad trash bags and other plastic products, Mobil Chemical Co. for Hefty photodegradable trash bags, R Med International for TenderCare diapers and American Enviro Products for Bunnies diapers.

These companies and apparently others received a letter from FTC attorney Michael Dershowitz shortly before Christmas. The letter said in part, "The commission's staff is conducting an inquiry regarding your advertising. . . . to determine whether you are or have engaged in unfair or deceptive acts or practices. . . ."

The letter requested copies of all ads and promotional materials for products that use environmental claims, as well as studies used to substantiate the claims.

The FTC's concern about environmental ad claims coincides with a similar probe by seven state attorneys general led by Minnesota Attorney General Hubert H. Humphrey III.

Mr. Humphrey and FTC Chairman Janet Steiger 10 days ago agreed to work "in partnership" to avoid duplication and inconsistencies, said Doug Blanke, Minnesota assistant attorney general.

The multistate task force has told four marketers to submit certain ads for review. Mobil is one; the others couldn't be determined.

"We would be happy to send substantiation for the claims to the states and FTC," said Allen Gray, a Mobil spokesman.

Mr. Gray said the photodegradable claim for Hefty trash bags is made only on packaging, not in ads. Wells, Rich, Greene, New York, is the agency.

Bruce Ipe, First Brands VP-general counsel, said the company was asked to supply the FTC with information on ads concerning the degradability of plastics and the effect of plastics on the environment. The request covered Glad bags and other plastics products.

First Brands didn't get a letter from the multistate task force, Mr. Ipe said.

"We're preparing to submit to the FTC our support and substantiation for the claim, and we're seeking to supply that by the end of January," Mr. Ipe said.

Glad trash bags carry a label promoting its "limited degradability," Mr. Ipe said. The claim is also made in print ads via Leo Burnett USA, Chicago. □

Campbell's ceo decision nears amid internal strife

By Judann Dagnoli

Campbell USA President Herb Baum, a well-known figure in the advertising and marketing worlds, could rejoin the agency ranks if things don't work out for him at Campbell.

Mr. Baum, a former Needham, Harper & Steers executive, has been offered a job with at least one ad agency, sources close to him said, and will consider an agency career depending on developments in Campbell Soup Co.'s search for a new ceo.

Mr. Baum, 53, and Senior VP-Chief Financial Officer Edwin Harper, 47, have been considered top candidates for the ceo post left vacant when President-CEO R. Gordon McGovern, 63, resigned last November.

Campbell is remaining mum on its selection, which may be announced this week. But some observers believe the job will go to an outside executive.

In a statement Dec. 29, the company said the board's "first choice" has accepted the post but that "final board deliberation" will take place this week.

Campbell declined to elaborate.

Chairman Robert Vlasic, who issued the statement, is reported to be at odds with some Dorrance family members of the board. The family together holds 59% of Campbell.

Six Dorrance family members controlling a 17.4% stake in Campbell last week filed notice with the Securities & Exchange Commission that they intend to sell or swap their shares.

In a statement to the press, the group said it will "oppose any attempt by the company to adopt any barriers to impede in any way any proposal" to sell the company.

A major faction, led by John Dorrance III, reportedly wants to keep the company independent.

Mr. Vlasic's Dec. 29 statement tried to deflect sale speculation, saying he "expressed confidence in the continued future independence" of the company.

Observers last week found it hard to narrow the list of possible suitors for such a plum as Campbell but said it could attract such blue-chip names as Philip Morris Cos., Borden, H.J. Heinz Co., Anheuser-Busch, Unilever and Procter & Gamble Co.

Depressed company profits, apparently caused in part by inflated ad and marketing expenditures, are said to have contributed to Campbell's vulnerability.

It delivered an 8.8% return on invested capital in 1989, compared with about 13% for other food companies. The slower growth is attributed to annual ad spending increases of 15% or more and a torrent of new products. □

LAST MINUTE NEWS

Bond trouble brews

LA CROSSE, Wis.—The future of Alan Bond's control of G. Heileman Brewing Co. may be in doubt after an Australian court's decision last week to put some of Mr. Bond's brewing assets in receivership. The National Australian Bank contends Bond Brewing has broken convenants of a loan agreement; the company said it's met payments of principal and interest.

Although the decision doesn't involve Heileman, officials at Bond Corp. Holdings admitted the move endangered Mr. Bond's worldwide empire. Bond officials pledged to try to get it overturned when Australian courts reopened this week.

There was some speculation last week that the move in Australia might prompt U.S. lenders to take similar action for Mr. Bond's U.S. assets. Mr. Bond paid $1.2 billion for Heileman in late 1987; he subsequently sold off about $300 million in assets and those remaining are now worth well under $500 million, brewing industry sources said.

Agencies for Heileman, the nation's fifth-largest brewer, include Young & Rubicam, Chicago; W.B. Doner & Co., Baltimore and Chicago; and Chiat/Day/Mojo, San Francisco.

Cola giants attack

ATLANTA—Coca-Cola Co. is positioning its Diet Sprite lemon-lime soft drink against Diet Pepsi in a TV spot to air Jan. 28 during the Super Bowl. Created by Lowe Marschalk, New York, the spot is now appearing in movie theaters and on the "When Harry Met Sally. . ." film video. Rival Pepsi-Cola Co., meanwhile, on Dec. 31 broke its first-quarter "Right one" campaign for reformulated Diet Pepsi. Spots make a taste superiority claim over Diet Coke,

'Unregulation' ruled

Agency merger activity was indeed small change compared with the goings-on among clients.

Reynolds acquired Nabisco, which had acquired Standard Brands; Kohlberg Kravis acquired them all. Philip Morris Cos. bought General Foods Corp. and then Kraft. Kohlberg Kravis earlier had bought Beatrice Cos., which had bought Esmark, which had bought Norton Simon Inc.

Pillsbury Co. went to England's Grand Metropolitan and Carnation Co. to Switzerland's Nestle. Eastman Kodak Co. bought Sterling Drug; P&G bought Richardson-Vicks and Noxell Corp. Chesebrough-Pond's, Faberge and Elizabeth Arden Inc. went to Unilever.

The deal-making has thoroughly reshaped the advertiser landscape. Of the 100 Leading National Advertisers in 1980, as identified by Advertising Age, one-third no longer exist as independent companies.

The feverish activity wasn't only tolerated but encouraged by the Reagan administration, which set the tone for the decade by letting the free enterprise marketplace decide what was best. The U.S. Department of Justice and Federal Trade Commission remained on the sidelines and let the players go at it.

Whether that will prove good or bad for the economy over the long haul is a matter of debate, but it was unquestionably good—financially at least—for many of the players, especially deal-makers like Kohlberg Kravis and junk-bond king Michael Milken, as well as top executives of companies involved.

"Golden parachutes" and "greenmail" entered the vernacular; "obscene" was used to describe merger fees and executive salaries.

Client company mergers and takeovers have thoroughly reshaped the advertising landscape.

Perhaps nowhere in Washington was free enterprise more extolled, and with more effect, than at the Federal Communications Commission under Reagan appointee Mark Fowler, who inaugurated what he proudly called the era of "unregulation."

Liberated from such encumbrances as "public interest" requirements and limitations on station ownership, and swept up by technology and the times, broadcasting magnates had a field day.

Midsize companies like Multimedia and Storer Communications first attracted bids, and then came the big one: In March 1985, Capital Cities Communications bought American Broadcasting Cos.

"To paraphrase Pogo," Peter Jennings said on ABC that night, "we have seen the news and it is us."

General Electric Co. soon had RCA Corp.—and NBC—in its tent, and financier Laurence Tisch took charge at CBS.

TV stations, which the FCC ruled no longer had to be held for a minimum period, were bought and sold like hog futures, singly and in groups. By 1988, 11 of the top 20 broadcasting companies had changed owners or merged.

They laughed when Ted Turner started Cable News Network in 1980, but cable TV came of age in the 1980s. Independent stations, some of whose programming was carried afar by cable, grew in popularity. Network TV viewing went into a steady decline that shows no signs of ending.

Australian-born (but now U.S. citizen) Rupert Murdoch emerged as the truly global media baron. He bought TV Guide for $3 billion to go with New York Magazine, the Boston Herald, the Times of London and other print media in the News Corp. stable—not to mention 20th Century Fox Film Corp., some top-market independent TV stations and Fox Broadcasting Co.

Cities with competing newspapers continued to dwindle in number, but Allen Neuharth's USA Today proved there was a market for a colorful, punchy product. The new Gannett Co. paper soon had newspapers across the country mimicking it.

And at decade's end, Time Inc., which initially planned to merge in a stock swap with Warner Communications, ended up buying Warner to fend off a bid for Time by Paramount Communications.

Without Warner, Time publications ran 22% of U.S. magazine advertising and earned a third of U.S. magazine profits; the company's video operations provided even more revenue than magazines.

The new company, Time Warner, became the world's largest media company (combined revenues: $10.6 billion), albeit one saddled with debt.

The consumers these super entities wanted to sell to were no less voracious than the deal-makers. They were typified by the yuppies, whose media visibility seemed grossly disproportionate to their actual numbers.

But they were "acquisitive, stylish . . . important trend setters and role models" and thus "the marketers' darling," reported Langer Associates, a market research company.

The stereotypical yuppie drove a BMW, ate sushi and drank Per rier. His motto was "Take care o yourself" and he worked out i designer sweats.

In 1986, Grey Advertisin called a news conference to gus over new research heralding "th

Free-wheeling broadcasting magnates had a field day in the new laissez faire atmosphere.

Ultra Consumers," who ha "seemingly unlimited appetite for acquiring premium goods tha ooze with sensational immediac and impact." This was no "trend sliver," Grey added, but a "mas sive" segment that was "here t stay."

In fact, the population wa aging, but outside of Lear's, fe seemed to notice. Young yuppie showed up ad nauseam in adver tising, whose creators labore mightily to come up with fres depictions of conspicuous con sumption.

Gimmicks were also in: One o the decade's most heralded com mercials featured dancing Clay mation raisins; another, a gu who talked fast.

Style reigned over substance We had "New Wave" advertisin from the U.K., computer-gen erated images, shaky minicams quick cuts, marvelous special ef fects.

The industry became like " rich kid with too many toys," sai James Jordan, chairman of Jor dan, McGrath, Case & Taylo New York. "He doesn't have to b ingenious, or insightful or inven tive. He can play with one to until he gets bored with it."

We had recycled oldies, misty eyed flag-waving and fake cinem verite. After the market fell, w got bosses who threatened to neu ter errant subordinates ("Yuppie in hell," one copywriter dubbe the genre).

Creativity also yielded to wh could pay the most money to ge the biggest name. So we got Mi chael Jackson, Bruce Willis an Tina Turner. And in the waning days of the '80s, we learned tha American Express Co. was goin to give us Paul Newman, too.

It wasn't a big idea, but it was unquestionably, another bi deal. □ ended there was stunned silence, followed by a standing ovation that Mr. Murray estimates lasted 15 minutes.

The agency and Apple's marketing staff then addressed the media buy. Originally, Chiat proposed airing the spot New Year's Day during the college football bowl games.

That plan was rejected because of the time lag between the spot and the Macintosh introduction, scheduled for the shareholders meeting Jan. 24.

The idea of airing the spot on the Super Bowl Jan. 22 then emerged. For the same money as the proposed Jan. 1 buy, Apple could purchase 60 seconds of the highest-rated program on TV.

Money was available. Apple had earmarked some $15 million for the Macintosh introduction, about seven times more than any other Apple product debut. Buoyed by the rave review of its sales force, Apple approved purchase of a second one-minute slot.

But after viewing the spot for the first time, the company's cost- and image-conscious board of directors rejected the Super Bowl airing and directed the marketing staff and the agency to begin selling off the 120 seconds it had purchased.

Apple lore holds that the company's other founder, Steve Wozniak, who was then only minimally involved, approached Mr. Jobs, took out his checkbook and said, "I'll pay for half if you pay for the other half."

That option aside, the agency responded to the crisis in two ways, according to Greg Helm, former Chiat senior VP-management supervisor and now president of Stein, Robaire & Helm, Los Angeles.

"There were two different activities going on," he says. "One was genuinely trying to sell the time. The media department and various individuals who had contacts around the country were making calls to try to get the time sold. Simultaneously, the account group and account planning were working hard to make a case for not selling the time and not cancelling the spot."

Chiat managed to sell off 30 seconds each to United Airlines and McDonald's Corp., but couldn't attract any offer even close to the $500,000 it paid for the second 60-second slot.

Two days before the game, Apple still owned the time, and the economics of the situation won out. The board grudingly approved airing "1984."

The unique nature of the commercial—it only ran that once on network TV—became even clearer a year later.

In an attempt to outdo the previous effort, Apple approved the airing of the equally elaborate "Lemmings" commercial the following year. That spot fell flat, although both Messrs. Hayden and Clow keep the commercial on their reels.

Mr. Hayden readily admits the importance "1984" has had on his career, but he also notes the influence of luck in creation of the commercial.

Furthermore, he says "Apple i systemically incapable of doin that spot today," given the mat ration of both the company a the PC industry.

In many ways, those who reca their participation see it as a ki of harmonic convergence.

"It was one of those magic things," Mr. Murray says. "A l of people with unique talents col lided at exactly the right min ute." □ nor did he get approval to use her work in the proposal.

But by the agency's and the company's account, when AmEx executives saw the mockup, they decided immediately that she was the photographer they wanted.

Ms. Leibovitz's initial mistrust of Ogilvy's assurances that AmEx wanted her to do her own thing has been well-publicized. But some two and a half years later, she has all the enthusiasm of a true believer.

"I feel like I'm just getting started," she says when asked if the appeal of the campaign has worn thin through repetition. "It's tremendously hard work, but I really am starting to enjoy myself. You know, people are amazingly interesting. And these people are so confident, they give you 100%, and that's exciting.

Asked if her work for the campaign has changed, she replies, "I'm pushing myself, I'm trying to be better. I've become more involved with the editing process recently, and I'm in more touch with the client. In the beginning, I didn't know how much freedom I really had. I was more nervous, and most of all concerned with pleasing Parry. Now I feel more comfortable flying on my own."

Just how long Ms. Leibovitz can keep up with AmEx's grueling demands is an open question, however, especially as the campaign grows internationally.

This year, the campaign will expand to Germany, featuring five prominent people there. Also planned are five new executions for Hong Kong, and discussions with other countries are in the works.

The schedule has forced Mr. Merkley to delegate art direction in some cases to other Ogilvy creative people, but Ms. Leibovitz is considered irreplacable.

"She needs to clone herself. We just go by her schedule and do what we can do. There's only one Annie. So far so good," Mr. Merkley says.

Meanwhile, the beat goes on in the U.S. with the newest set of seven portraits scheduled to appear in Time's "Man of the Year" issue.

For the first time, Time has sold all the ad space surrounding the "Man of the Year" feature to one marketer, AmEx, which will run 14 pages of ads.

The portraits that will join the AmEx collection: cellist Yo Yo Ma, director Rob Reiner, actress Mary Steenburgen, politician Barbara Jordan, writer Tom Clancy, Sammy Davis Jr. and, in a single photograph, hockey greats Wayne Gretzky and Gordie Howe. □

GM slices $80 million in ads

By Raymond Serafin and Wayne Walley

General Motors Corp. is scaling back its 1990 ad spending plans by an estimated $80 million or more across a wide variety of media, a move that could signal an end to the big automotive spending jumps of recent years.

Sources say GM will inform the TV networks today that it's trimming upfront second-quarter commitments by about 20%, saving an estimated $15 million to $20 million.

Reductions in other media are expected to unfold as GM's individual divisions review their plans.

Agency sources speculated the cuts will largely be at the expense of planned budget increases, leaving GM to spend at approximately 1989 media levels of about $1 billion.

One idea to reduce costly marketing expenditures that's said to be gaining momentum within GM is to eliminate consumer incentives, Automotive News reported.

Such a move would cause major ripples in the auto marketplace, where domestic companies and many importers have engaged in furious incentive wars.

The thinking is that industry sales will be poor anyway, so it could be a good time to go cold turkey on incentives. Previously, such action hasn't been taken because of fear other automakers wouldn't follow suit, insiders say.

GM is also re-evaluating future product programs, though product-development sources say 1991 and 1992

Hearst targets Meredith's turf

By Scott Donaton

NEW YORK—Hearst Corp. is taking on home-magazine kingpin Meredith Corp., setting the stage for a share battle in one of the fastest-growing categories in magazine publishing.

Hearst Magazines will launch two home-oriented magazines this year. These will join its four established shelter books in the new Hearst Home Group.

In March, Hearst will publish a test issue of Countryside, the brainchild of John Mack Carter, director of magazine development.

A second issue will be published in the fall, when Hearst will also release a second issue of American Home, which was tested on newsstands last summer.

The titles will join House Beautiful, Country Living, Colonial Homes and Victoria in the Home Group, under the direction of D. Claeys Bahrenburg, exec VP-group publishing director at Hearst Magazines.

Nestle, Disney team abroad

By Kevin Cote

Nestle and Walt Disney Co. are linking up in a way that could rock food marketing in Europe.

Under a new licensing agreement, Nestle can create branded food products and promotional packages throughout Europe and in other areas, including the Soviet Union.

Along with becoming a "participant company" at Euro Disneyland, in which Nestle brands will be featured in 11 restaurants and other sites at the Magic Kingdom opening near Paris in 1992, Nestle will participate in joint marketing programs for the park throughout Europe.

"We'll be the only food company . . . with Disney characters," said Michel

Reinarz, Nestle director of visual communications. "A major advantage from a marketing point of view is that we'll be able to create promotions in stores. . . . That's a tremendous argument to show retailers you are in partnership with them and want to build traffic in their stores."

As a hypothetical example, Mr. Reinarz said Nestle subsidiary Maggi could launch "Pluto spaghetti."

Nestle has proof the Disney connection works. Three years ago, Nestle introduced Mickey Mousse, a chocolate-flavor dessert, in West Germany under an earlier, more limited licensing agreement with Disney. The brand's share is now about equal to a mousse brand once dominant in the category, said a product manager at Nestle West Germany.

'N.Y. Times' mulls weekly

NEW YORK—The New York Times Co. is planning to launch a magazine to compete with such titles as Spy, 7 Days and Forbes Inc.'s soon-to-be hatched Egg, sources said. The weekly publication would be inserted into The New York Times starting this fall. Nancy Nielsen, the company's director of corporate relations, said only that "it is one of the projects under consideration." Separately, rumors resurfaced that Dow Jones' The Wall Street Journal will launch a weekly magazine as early as this year. A spokesman said a magazine is under consideration, but it's hard to say whether the launch would be this year.

Ky. ad tax looms

FRANKFORT, Ky.—Gov. Wallace Wilkinson on Jan. 16 will unveil a tax package that's expected to include a proposal to extend the state's 5% sales tax to advertising and other services. A spokesman for the governor said Gov. Wilkinson was still considering several tax options, including an ad tax, but hadn't made up his mind. But industry representatives said they expect the Democratic governor to propose the tax, then stand back and let the Legislature decide whether to implement it.

Disney goes for magazine magic

By Marcy Magiera

Walt Disney Co. is set to extend the boundaries of its already-vast communications kingdom with the fall launch of Disney Adventure Digest, its first U.S. mass-market consumer magazine.

A potentially huge player in the lucrative children's magazine market, the ad-supported Digest will be "monthly at the very get go," said Michael Lynton, VP-marketing for Walt Disney Publishing. Eventually, he said, it will be published "at least" every other week.

The Digest will be sold at 30,000 supermarket checkouts, Disney said. A cover price and ad rates haven't been set.

So far, no advertisers have signed with the magazine, which is designed to appeal to children ages 7 to 11.

The magazine's launch coincides with the fall premiere of the Disney Afternoon, a 2-hour block of syndicated children's TV programming.

Editorially, the Digest will feature programming and other information on "Chip 'N Dale Rescue Rangers," "DuckTales," "Tale Spin" and "Disney's Gummi Bears," the shows that make up the Disney Afternoon, as well as offer games, puzzles and comics. The Digest will be cross-promoted within the programming block.

Disney's Buena Vista Television plans a $100 million marketing effort starting this spring to promote the fall launch of Disney Afternoon. The effort will include national cross-promotions with McDonald's Corp. and Kellogg Co., both potential advertisers for the Digest, and cross-promotions throughout Disney's entertainment network.

Other youth-oriented magazines competing for the Digest's target of 7-to-11-year-olds include Time Warner monthly Sports Illustrated for Kids; Boys' Life, published monthly by the Boy Scouts of America; and Welsh Publishing Group's quarterly Barbie.

Disney last year expanded its movie, TV, home video, theme park and consumer products empire to include a third movie label, Hollywood Pictures, and a record label, Hollywood Records.

The company this month in Latin America launched nine new Spanish-language comics, featuring Mickey Mouse and other Disney characters.

It publishes similar comic magazines in Europe through licensing agreements.

In the U.S., Disney publishes two ad-supported consumer magazines, Mickey Mouse and DuckTales. Both quarterlies are aimed at children under age 7 and are sold primarily by subscription.

Nissan taps Europe team

By Laurel Wentz

LONDON—A three-way tussle over Nissan Motor Co.'s $15 million-plus European corporate account is about to end with an announcement later this month of a TBWA-Hakuhodo victory.

The win illustrates a new way that Japanese agencies are increasingly doing business in Europe.

Lacking agency networks in Europe, Japanese agencies are being forced by their clients to team up with European agencies.

Three of Nissan's Japanese agencies sought partners last year to pitch the Nissan business after the marketer stipulated the contenders work with a European shop.

Hakuhodo, Tokyo, picked TBWA. Dentsu paired up with BVH, a Rotterdam, Netherlands-based agency chosen because the account will be run from Nissan's new European headquarters in Amsterdam. Standard Advertising, Japan's No. 21 agency, teamed up with European network GGK plus Chiat/Day/Mojo, New York. Chiat handles Nissan in the U.S.

Sources confirmed the TBWA-Hakuhodo team won the account, but Nissan is trying to keep the decision secret until later this month when a formal announcement will be made.

The TBWA-Hakuhodo duo appeared to be in the strongest position from the start. Hakuhodo in Tokyo for years has been handling a corporate Nissan account, a forerunner to the new European business.

TBWA has valuable experience handling automotive accounts and no conflicts. The agency handled Spanish automaker SEAT throughout Europe until last year, when it lost the business to Paris-based N W Ayer Europe.

Dentsu's partner, BVH, has no experience on automotive accounts.

Standard, the third Japanese contender, opened an Amsterdam agency last fall but doesn't have enough European experience yet, sources said, adding that its partner GGK handles Volkswagen, considered a drawback.

Japanese advertisers are finding a pan-European corporate account gives them an opportunity to use a single agency and create one image across Europe.

Census asks mail favor

By Steven W. Colford

WASHINGTON—The Direct Marketing Association, at the request of the U.S. Census Bureau, is asking members not to issue mailings that would coincide with the March 23 mailing of census forms to 88 million U.S. households.

DMA Senior VP Connie Heatley declined to predict how many association members will comply but said the response from mailers so far had been encouraging.

The census bureau is trying to minimize chances the forms might be discarded as another piece of "junk mail," said Rudolph Brewington, census promotion specialist. The forms are expected to reach households within a day or two of the mailing and are to be returned by April 1, he said.

In 1989, direct-mail volume was about 21 million pieces a day, the DMA said. The census bureau's request for a brief halt of third-class mail around March 23 didn't specify a suggested period of time.

The association has been running a print campaign, handled in-house, in trade magazines and its newsletter to make members aware of the census arrival date.

Gene Del Polito, executive director of the Third Class Mail Association, said he doubted the request would—or could—be honored.

"I don't think mailers will pay any attention to that," he said. "It's impossible to honor a request like that" because mailers can't gauge precisely when their mail will be delivered to households.

However, David Hochberg, VP-public affairs at catalog mailer Lillian Vernon Corp., said complying with the request shouldn't affect operations dramatically.

"We will plan around it if it's just a few days," he said.

Cataloger Hammacher, Schlemmer & Co. changed its schedule so it wouldn't compete with the census forms.

"The competition is just too great. . . . We'd rather mail at another time when consumers can spend more time with our information," said Susan Sanders, public relations manager.

Public service ads to promote public cooperation with the census will be mailed out this week, Mr. Brewington said.

Five agencies are putting together creative for the campaign, coordinated by the Advertising Council. Ogilvy & Mather, New York, handles the umbrella campaign; Mingo Group, New York, targets blacks; Castor GS&B, New York, targets Hispanics; Muse Cordero Chen, Los Angeles, handles the Asian-American campaign; and West Indies & Grey, New York, handles a campaign for Puerto Rico.

The 1990 census' ad and promotion budget is $73 million, more than triple the 1980 budget. □

Advertisers hold the hot hand

P&G's buy into 'Joker's Wild' could revolutionize how shows get syndicated

By Wayne Walley

Syndicators, locked in an increasingly tough battle to sell new shows to TV stations, have found a new potential ally: national advertisers.

A number of syndicators are trying to sell the barter time in new shows before pitching the property to local TV stations. Some industry analysts suggest deals such as Procter & Gamble Co.'s sizable "upfront" buy into "The Joker's Wild" will become standard practice in the future.

With a national marketer involved, so the theory goes, more doors at stations and attractive time periods in that station's programming schedule might open.

"If you go in with a project already presold to one group, even if it is the advertiser, it can be effective," says Tim Duncan executive director, Advertiser Syndicated Television Association.

"The problem facing syndicators is finding a place to sell programs and getting the right time periods. Of the 110 syndicated shows on the air this year, only 37 were new. There is more stability in the marketplace and you need an edge," Mr. Duncan says.

The idea of selling barter time before selling the show to enough stations to cover 70% or more of the country is not new. But few advertisers had been willing to take the risk.

"Syndication has become a much more difficult proposition today," says Michael Drexler, exec VP-national media director, Bozell, New York. "So from a syndicator's standpoint, it makes a whole lot of sense to be able to put that kind of money in the bank.

"And the advertiser is saying, 'Make it attractive enough to me and I will share the risk on clearances.' But I think an advertiser also has to have enough confidence in a particular show and the demographics of that program to be willing to do this," Mr. Drexler says.

With today's tight programming market, syndicators also seem more willing to create attractive deals to entice marketers.

For example, P&G bought all the barter time for the first year's run of Orbis Communications' "The Joker's Wild" before the show was sold to any TV station or presented at this week's National Association of Television Program Executives meeting in New Orleans.

P&G bought 520 30-second commercial units valued at around $13 million, which translates into one minute of time per show, five shows a week for 52 weeks.

"We strongly believe that this show has the potential to become a big hit for the 1990s," says Jim Connell, a P&G media manager. "Based upon our experience in syndication, we see 'Joker' as an attractive vehicle to reach our key brand target audiences."

The fact that Mr. Connell used the plural "audiences" is a key element in determining whether an advertiser hooks up with a show, Mr. Drexler says. "You have to have enough products with comparable targets to want to pick up most or all of the national units available. You can't do it if you have one product."

Neither Orbis nor P&G would disclose particulars of what possibly will become a landmark deal, but most industry analysts believe the syndicator gave P&G an attractive price on the ad time in exchange for the early commitment.

Thomas Frank, Orbis VP-programming and the deal's architect, would only say the company is "very, very pleased" with the rates P&G paid and described the arrangement as "the ultimate 'upfront' deal."

"They wanted a long-term franchise po-

Syndication season searching for sizzle

Kid fare gain, but sameness permeates

By Ken Wylie

The current TV syndication season rates no higher than a C or B-, according to an Advertising Age poll of industry experts.

Reasons cited for the lackluster performance generally touch on a glut of programming characterized by a numbing sameness.

"How many talk shows can you watch? How many game shows? And there hasn't been a new hit in game shows for a long time," winces Jon Mandel, senior VP, director-national broadcasting at Grey Advertising, New York.

"Most programs are now underperforming—drastically underperforming," says Dick Hobbs, senior VP, media director at Leo Burnett USA, Chicago.

He credits the problem to a flood of programs in key categories, which Mr. Mandel prefers to call an "embarrassment of riches."

Quality is the primary concern of Dick Kurlander, Petry Television's VP-programming. "You go to NATPE and see 100 syndicated programs previewed; 30 to 40 are OK, and maybe 10 pan out. Of those, five or six will do well. So, if you get five or six in a season, you're doing pretty well. This is syndication, but it's very much like the experience of the networks," he says.

Evidence that TV viewers are more frequently turning off first-run syndicated programming is seen in Nielsen Media Research ratings covering the Sept. 18 to Nov. 12, 1989 period vs. the same period in 1988. Regardless of programming type, each category shows an audience decline.

In the game show category, by far the highest rated of syndication categories, the average 1989 rating (the number of households viewing a show as a percentage of total TV households) for shows that also appeared in 1988 was 6.5, down 13.8% from 1988, based on total "households using television" of 47.9 million. This HUT level was down 14.5%, while total U.S. households increased 1.9% to 92.1 million from 1988 to 1989.

Only "Jeopardy" increased, rising 0.8% to a 12.2 rating. "Win, Lose or Draw" dropped the most dramatically, from 6.8 in 1988 to 1.7 in 1989.

Of the 14 game shows in 1989, six were new and the highest rating mustered by any one of the six was 2.2 by Warner Bros.' "The Fun House." The new shows' poor ratings lowered the average rating composite for all game shows to 4.4, while the eight returning shows had a composite 6.5 rating.

Children's programming was the only category benefitting from strong new shows, as evidenced by the total category rating being higher in 1989 than that of only renewed shows. In fact, those contacted for the poll reacted with a certain euphoria over children's programming.

The average for all children's programs was a 1.9 rating, compared with 1.6 for the holdovers from 1988. "Chip 'n Dale's Rescue Rangers," a 1989 entry and the current ratings' leader among all children's programs at a 4.7 average, was reason enough for the higher category average. The fourth and fifth-rated programs in the category, "Super Mario Bros. Super Show" and "Muppet Babies" with ratings of 2.9 and 2.8, respectively, also were 1989 arrivals.

Among newsmagazine-format shows, two programs were among the few syndicated offerings to register ratings growth. "Current Affair" climbed to an 8.4 rating from 5.8 in 1988, and "Entertainment Tonight" rose to 8.1 from 6.5.

The category also saw two hot new successes: "Inside Edition" with a 4.5 rating, and "Hard Copy" at 4.4. Half of the 30 programs in this broad category were new, lending credence to industry watchers' charges of both glut and sameness.

Only "Donahue," "Live—Regis and Kathy Lee" and "Sally Jesse Raphael" showed year-to-year ratings growth among the 11 talk shows, six of which were new.

But one of the newcomers, "Arsenio Hall Show," while drawing only a 3.2 rating for the three-month average, did it after midnight. The show revived late-night for a lot of independent stations, analysts say.

The fact that new entries—56 out of the 124 total programs monitored by Nielsen in first-run syndication—could seldom match the higher ratings of holdovers with declining ratings supports the bearish outlook for the 1990 syndication market.

"My fear . . . is that [syndication] won't grow and will fade in importance," says Mr. Mandel.

Syndication also risks becoming a commodity property.

"Stations aren't terribly disappointed, because they didn't have terribly high expectations. They bought shows because they had sprocket holes to fill," says Mike Levinton, VP, director-programming, Blair Television, New York.

But there is some hope about the coming season. "A lot of shows look good, such as 'The Joker's Wild' and 'Tic Tac Dough,' " he says, also pointing to some of the magazine shows as being promising. □

Buyers sort through the inventory

Last year, advertisers exercised their influence over TV programming as never before. Witness the number of shows that advertisers pulled out of or those programs that suffered a backlash when they delved into sensitive topics, such as "thirtysomething's" portrayal of two men in bed together.

Although syndicated fare may not be as racy, advertisers and media buyers are no less opinionated regarding syndicated programming. Advertising Age asked some leading syndication buyers to evaluate current offerings.

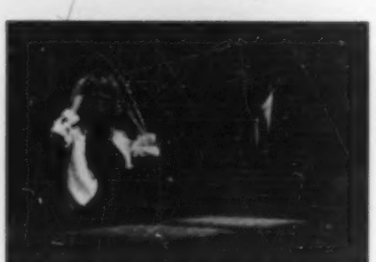
"DuckTales," a strip from Buena Vista Television, started the trend toward healthy kid shows, says Dick Kurlander, VP-programming at Petry Television. "Youth programmers are treating kids now as if they had brains."

Hit-status also is ascribed to "Chip 'n Dale's Rescue Rangers," "Super Mario Bros. Super Show," and "Teenage Mutant Ninja Turtles" by John Von Soosten, VP, director-programming, Katz Television.

"Shows that have been difficult to get off the ground this season are 'Inside Edition' and 'Hard Copy,' which is not doing as well as the syndicator hoped. Also, 'After Hours' is not so OK," says Mark Goldstein, senior VP, director-national broadcast media and programming, Lintas:New York.

" 'Inside Edition' has had problems although now it's improving. 'Hard Copy' is still trying to find its position. It's not in the same league with 'A Current Affair,' " says Mr. Von Soosten.

"['Crime Watch Tonight'] was a misguided effort—all crime. It couldn't grow; had very little female audience; and was incredibly graphic in its crime depiction.



While "Hard Copy" has had some rough times, "Arsenio Hall" is reviving late-night viewing.

"On the other hand, another crime-oriented show, 'America's Most Wanted,' is doing well. It catches crooks," says Petry's Mr. Kurlander.

"Arsenio Hall" is really reviving late-night for a lot of independent stations," says Katz' Mr. Von Soosten.

Joel Segal, exec VP, director-national broadcast at McCann-Erickson says, " 'Arsenio' has lived up to expectations, as promised by the syndicator."

"Who's the Boss?" is meeting expectation levels among off-network syndicated properties. "It's marketed on the coattails of 'Cosby,' so the price is on the high side, but the point is, it is doing what was promised," says Petry's Mr. Kurlander.

"The 'Oprah Winfrey Show,' 'Jeopardy' and 'Wheel of Fortune' performed well for us even though the demographics didn't look ideal at first [for promoting Wrigley's chewing gum to ages 12 to 34]," says Nancy Swiet, VP-associate media director, BBDO, Chicago.

"You have to look at the time a show runs. A 2.5 for 'Byron Allen' late at night was and is acceptable, but it wouldn't be for 'Wheel of Fortune' or 'Jeopardy,' " says Mr. Goldstein of Lintas.

"Nothing is bad this year, but there certainly has been no second-coming. Some new shows haven't really been tremendous, but expectations weren't high that they would be—shows such as 'The Joan Rivers Show,' " says Mike Levinton, VP, director-programming, Blair Television.

Petry's Mr. Kurlander added an amen to the "Joan Rivers" assessment: "I would have expected it to do better. It's no disaster, but a disappointment."

"I continue to be surprised that wrestling does as well as it does. We have a number of advertisers in syndication wrestling," says M-E's Mr. Segal.

Reynolds kills Uptown

WINSTON-SALEM, N.C.—R.J. Reynolds Tobacco said late Friday it's canceling the planned test of controversial Uptown menthol cigarettes, a new brand targeted to black smokers. In a statement, RJR said the test planned for early February in Philadelphia couldn't be accurate because of "the unfair and biased attention the brand had received."

Uptown had been under fire from U.S. Secretary of Health & Human Services Louis Sullivan and several health, black-interest and anti-smoking groups.

"Our intentions in test-marketing Uptown . . . have been misconstrued and misrepresented by the anti-smoking lobby," said Peter Hoult, RJR exec VP-marketing. "Our sole purpose, plainly and simply, was to market a cigarette among smokers who currently buy competitive products. . . .

"We regret that a small coalition of anti-smoking zealots apparently believes that black smokers are somehow different from others who choose to smoke and must not be allowed to exercise the same freedom of choice available to all other smokers. This represents a loss of choice for black smokers and a futher erosion of the free-enterprise system."

FCB/Leber Katz Partners, New York, was handling the brand.

America's oat bran craze on the wane

Controversial research fuels product fallout

By Julie Liesse and Judann Dagnoli

The controversy over oat bran's power to lower cholesterol levels, triggered by a new scientific study last week, may hasten a shakeout already under way among oat bran products.

"What it did is confirm my suspicions about the oat bran market fading," said a Chicago retailer. "We're in a position to start weeding out some oat brans, and this gives me ammunition."

But the controversy won't have an impact on the general health food craze, and consumers may simply switch from oat bran to other brans, sources say.

Hardest and soonest to be hit will be faddish products such as oat bran beer, industry analysts believe.

But even General Mills and Quaker Oats Co. could feel some sales fallout from the study published in the New England Journal of Medicine that triggered the debate last week.

Cereal leader Kellogg Co., which has less of a stake in oat bran products, likely will feel the slightest impact from the study.

The research concluded that oat bran is no more effective in lowering a person's cholesterol level than other fiber foods, including refined wheat flour.

In other words, oat bran's impact on cholesterol levels could be coming from the fact that it's a dietary substitute for high-cholesterol foods, and other substitutes could work equally well, the study indicates.

On Wall Street, both General Mills and Quaker stock dropped immediately after the study's release.

"General Mills is the most exposed" with the oat bran study, said County NatWest Securities analyst Timothy Ramey, because "they have the shakiest claim to volume growth."

Arthur Schulze, General Mills vice chairman, disagreed.

"Sure, oat bran has brought some news to

Super Bowl: an ad snore

Coca-Cola Co.'s "Hilltop Reunion" spot is irresistible, especially since it includes children this time.

Clever spots, yes. Spectacular, magical . . . no

By Bob Garfield

Let's hope the game is good.

The hyper-hyped Super Bowl advertising, it turns out, will not meet America's publicity-generated expectations. At $700,000 per 30 seconds—and cumulatively tens of millions of dollars in production costs—you'd have anticipated something magical.

AD REVIEW

But mainly all we'll get is clever, lots of clever and entirely unmagical TV commercials. Last year's 3-D Diet Coke spot and Anheuser-Busch's "Bud Bowl I" took the game to unprecedented heights of marketing spectacle, creating precisely the commercial-break dilemma advertisers sought. A sneak preview at this year's most pre-publicized commercials reveals little to strain your bladder over.

In terms of power and drama, the 1990 crop is the advertising equivalent of a 38-6 Super Blowout: a lot of interesting action but not much to talk about.

The sole exception is Coca-Cola Co.'s "Hilltop Reunion," a smarmy exercise in nostalgia and sentimentality, a mawkish and manipulative faux celebration of world brotherhood, a cheap device for stirring viewer emotion.

And a terrific one.

Ky. governor kindles new ad-tax battle

By Steven W. Colford

Kentucky Gov. Wallace Wilkinson last week formally proposed a 5% sales tax on in-state advertising, a move that immediately sent the ad community into strategy-mapping huddles.

By aiming his tax at in-state advertising only, Gov. Wilkinson opted for a safer route than his friend, Gov. Bob Martinez of Florida, whose 1987 ad tax failed largely because it also included national advertising.

It's likely, but not certain, the Kentucky tax would apply to creative services as well as media, Press Secretary Doug Alexander said.

To promote his image as well as his tax proposals, Gov. Wilkinson is expected to break a TV campaign this week, Mr. Alexander said. The campaign was created by Sawyer/Miller Group, New York, the agency that handled the governor's 1988 election advertising (and also contributed to the unsuccessful 1988 presidential media campaign of Massachusetts Gov. Michael Dukakis).

Gov. Wilkinson—a Democrat, a millionaire and somewhat of a populist—included the ad-tax proposal in his 1990 state budget message that also advocated taxing other professional services.

Pressure for new revenue stems from the sorry state of Kentucky's educational system, which the state Supreme Court last June said was unconstitutional on a number of grounds.

W. Wilkinson

But aiming the 5% tax at the state's rather modest ad industry—total media estimated at $350 million a year—could force clients to migrate to agencies in surrounding states.

"We have a client that we bill about $2 million from, and they could just give that to another agency," said Greg King, VP at Meridian Advertising, Lexington. He was referring to the agency's share of the account of fast-food restaurant holding company Jerrico Inc.

Meridian is the state's third-largest agency, billing about $12 million; Doe-Anderson, Louisville, is the largest, billing about $34 million.

J.T. Whitlock, executive director of the Kentucky Broadcast Association, was optimistic that the Legislature would defeat the ad-tax proposal, but he nevertheless planned an all-out lobbying campaign. By the middle of this week, Mr. Whitlock said, broadcasters planned to meet with the state press association, chamber of commerce, cable industry and others to develop a coordinated response.

The cable industry was particularly upset since the tax proposal specifically included a 5% tax on monthly subscriber bills.

Bill Beam Jr., president of the Lexington Ad Club, said the state's four adclubs already had mailed anti-tax literature to the 138 legislators and said the clubs will consider a media campaign against the plan. □

Apple slump puts brake on ad spending plans

By Bradley Johnson

Apple Computer, slumping after four years of riding high, appears to be ready to cut planned ad spending in 1990.

Last year, Apple spent $45 million to $50 million in media advertising and was expected to spend as much as $55 million this year, a source close to the company said. That compares with Apple's peak of about $100 million in 1984.

But the 1990 spending plan is now in doubt, and Apple may just match '89 spending levels this year.

Apple last week reported an earnings drop of 11% in the first quarter ended Dec. 29, 1989. Mindful of Wall Street's aversion to reduced earnings, Apple Chairman John Sculley is implementing an across-the-board, cost-cutting program.

Apple's No. 2 marketing executive, Bruce Mowery, director of marketing information and communications, said the company hasn't yet decided what would be cut but added that Apple will review its mix of media spending, direct response and promotion.

"We really haven't spent a lot of time talking about" specific changes, he said. But he added, "When times are tough, you look at all the dollars you're spending."

Mr. Mowery said 1990 ad spending "will be in the range of last year."

Given its performance this past Christmas and flagging consumer interest in computers, Apple is re-evaluating its traditional Christmas promotions. Sales of its aging line of low-end consumer products dropped during the holiday period, while sales of its newer, high-end business computers increased "significantly," Mr. Sculley said.

Apple "could very well" decide to scale back its holiday promotion and ad spending, Mr. Mowery said. "It's something that we've got to reassess as we go into 1990."

"What we're seeing [in Apple's results] is first of all an industry-wide phenomenon rather than an Apple phenomenon," said Bruce Lupatkin, an analyst with Hambrecht & Quist.

The maturing $50 billion personal computer market this year will grow only about 9%, half the rate of last year and a fourth what the market was growing at in the mid-1980s, said Timothy Bajarin, exec VP of Creative Strategies Research International.

But whereas Apple emerged from the last industry slump in the mid-'80s with a hot product (the Macintosh), award-winning advertising and record ad spending, none of these components appears to be there now as Apple braces for tougher times.

The planned cost cutting reflects Apple's coming to grips with an industry slowdown.

However, Apple does enjoy a few significant advantages. The Mac has matured into a safe business alternative to IBM and IBM clones, and the existing base of satisfied customers affords a good platform on which to grow.

But as Apple has matured, its advertising may be losing the brashness that earned it so much attention in earlier years (including Advertising Age's "TV Com-

Univisa returns to broadcast

By Ed Fitch

The godfather of Spanish-language TV is back—and in a big way.

Emilio Azcarraga Milmo, the man behind the upcoming launch of The National sports daily, on March 1 will introduce Galavision, a regional Spanish-language U.S. broadcast network. It will compete with Univision Network and Telemundo Group.

Univisa, the company introducing the broadcast network, previously was in the U.S. over-the-air market but sold its Univision network to Hallmark Cards in 1987. Mr. Azcarraga is head of Televisa, Univisa's parent.

Galavision will include Univisa's 2.5 million-subscriber basic cable network of the same name.

Advertisers spent $304.9 million in Spanish-language TV in 1989, up 21% from the previous year, Hispanic Business reported.

The new network will offer a 16-hour daily network feed and plans to link broadcast stations in major Mexican/Central/South American markets in California, Texas, Illinois, Arizona and New Mexico.

"I think there's room for more media in certain markets, and there's room for more targeted media," said Fernando Diez Bar-

Blasting through ad clutter

Carmakers finding there's more than TV to draw consumers

By Raymond Serafin

Too many cars, not enough buyers.

The essential problem facing automakers can be reduced to that simple equation. That equation has a corollary: Too many cars, too many ad messages.

The surplus of cars and trucks has created a clutter of automotive advertising, a factor that's rapidly changing the rules for marketers. Messages that don't stand out or lack consistency are lost.

"All media channels are cluttered, but sometimes a whisper of the right phrase at the right time can be convincing," says Brent Bissell, senior VP-manager, McCann-Erickson Direct, Troy, Mich., which handles General Motors Corp.'s Buick division.

Wooing today's customer isn't easy.

"We have the toughest, smartest consumers we've ever had, and they have more choices than at any time in history," says Laurel Cutler, vice-chairman of FCB/Leber Katz Partners, New York, and VP-consumer affairs at Chrysler Corp. There are more than 40 car and light-truck brands, offering by some counts more than 600 models. "Customers are not willing to stay married to a single brand forever," says Ms. Cutler.

Among the trends emerging to meet these changes: risk-taking in creative and media approaches to break through the clutter; increased use of non-traditional tactics such as direct marketing with videos and event sponsorships; and greater coordination between different marketing functions to achieve a consistent look and message.

The so-called "overcapacity" problem has arrived despite the best five-year sales results in the industry's history. Sales of new cars and trucks topped 15 million units a year for four straight years until 1989, when they still reached about 14.7 million (a projection based on sales through Dec. 10), still a far better year than the last recession, which saw sales dip to 10.5 million in 1982.

The situation "is like musical chairs in reverse," says Bob Reuschle, senior VP-director of media for J. Walter Thompson USA, Detroit, which handles Ford Motor Co.'s Ford Division. When the music stops, no marketer wants to be the one hanging on to unsold vehicles.

If a sales slump that began in October continues much longer, overcapacity may worsen.

"We see the sales downturn lasting at least through the middle of the year [calendar 1990]," says Thomas O'Grady, president of Integrated Automotive Resources, a Wayne, Pa., marketing consultancy. National Automobile Dealers Association forecasts a 7% sales decline in 1990, to 13.7 million cars and trucks.

Agencies and media are watching to see if other auto marketers will follow the lead of General Motors Corp., which is responding to declining sales by cutting an estimated $80 million out of its 1990 ad budget.

The economics of the situation demand that automakers spend more to market their vehicles, says Mr. Reuschle; it is far more expensive to shut down a factory.

The experience of the past five years supports that view. New entries such as Acura, Daihatsu, Hyundai, Infiniti, Lexus, Range Rover, Sterling and Yugo have poured out sizable introductory marketing budgets, gained a bigger foothold, and marketing spending for existing models has soared to meet the new competition.

"There's no question spending by all the auto companies is up substantially," says Michael Drexler, exec VP-media at Bozell, New York, agency for Chrysler's corporate advertising and Chrysler/Plymouth divi-

Take the pulse

General Motors probably will stay inside when it replaces the retiring Roger Smith this year, but what if market share dips below 30? 25? 20?!? What if the only solution is to go outside for an heir to the GM throne? Here are some names we'd like to see GM consider:

Bo Schembechler...The former Michigan football coach could have the Detroit Tigers on solid footing for the pennant drive, so why not bring him in and see if Bo knows Firebirds, too?

Michael Moore...The ultimate in turning-the-other-cheek: Hire the director of the wicked "Roger & Me" documentary haunting GM in theaters around the U.S. Then again, maybe not.

Hal Riney...That voice, that voice. If ever there was a calm, settling, convincing front man to run rings around the contenders, Saturn's agency head is it.

Lee Iacocca...Go for the trifecta—he perked up Ford; he's the savior of Chrysler; what better way to wrap it up than re-righting the stumbling giant?

Ralph Nader...Hey, the Corvair controversy is long forgotten and the consumer is always right. Right? Nah.

Continental grounds Ayer

Contenders for $50M account may include JWT, Scali, WRG

By Jennifer Lawrence

HOUSTON—Continental Airlines late last week fired N W Ayer as agency of record on its estimated $50 million account.

James O'Donnell, the airline's senior VP-marketing, confirmed Ayer had been given 90 days' notice. The agency serviced the account from New York and Houston.

The Texas Air Corp. subsidiary this week is expected to invite a handful of agencies to pitch the business, with a selection possibly by March 1, Mr. O'Donnell said.

He declined to reveal the prospective shops, but sources familiar with the company named New York agencies J. Walter Thompson USA; Scali, McCabe, Sloves; and Wells, Rich, Greene as leading contenders. D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles also may be involved.

"We concluded that it was time for a change," Mr. O'Donnell responded, when asked why Continental fired the agency.

"The decision to part company with a fine agency like Ayer was extremely difficult," he said. "During our three-year relationship, Ayer did a substantial amount of good work for us. But in the end, we decided that it was not a good fit."

The air carrier's account had been troubled by an ongoing turnover of senior agency executives. Insiders speculated that the ad agency's mistake was failing to put a stable account management team in place—particularly for an airline whose business demands marketing decisions

Ad 'hype clutter' crowds out game

By Patricia Winters

Commercial "hype" is beginning to overtake the message.

What some are calling "hype clutter"—the publicity barrage surrounding advertising even before it hits the air—reached its zenith at yesterday's Super Bowl.

No longer just professional football's championship game, the Super Bowl has become a "commercial championship" among advertisers, with an ad buildup resembling that for the game itself.

While the idea of ads generating news isn't entirely new, never before has it reached such a crescendo.

"What's happening is that there are now two Super Bowls: the Super Bowl on the field and the Super Bowl of commercials," said Larry Kurlander, senior VP, American Express Travel Related Services Co.

AmEx departed from its publicity-shy stance this year by pre-announcing the airing of its spot with actor Paul Newman (see story on Page 2).

The strategy of leveraging interest in commercials into more airtime is now part of many marketers' game plans, including McDonald's Corp., Anheuser-Busch and Gillette Co., all of which ran spots on the Super Bowl and hyped them beforehand.

Obstacles mount for 'healthy foods'

An Advertising Age roundup

There's near chaos in the healthful foods marketplace.

From oat bran to rice bran to health "seals," companies that had counted on this trend carrying them into the 1990s are suddenly finding it extremely rough going. Roadblocks are appearing everywhere.

Just as the American Heart Association and participating food marketers were to kick off the HeartGuide labeling program this week, the Food & Drug Administration warned that participants were "risking regulatory action."

Just as Kellogg Co. disclosed the $30 million-to-$35 million introduction of Kenmei Rice Bran cereal, a Rice Council of America-funded study, expected to show cholesterol-lowering benefits for rice bran, didn't.

Just as that study came out, a second report questioning oat bran—this one co-sponsored by Quaker Oats Co.—was released.

Quaker turned around and produced a page newspaper ad that listed the 27 years' worth of health studies that did show cholesterol-lowering benefits for oat bran. It ran Friday in USA Today, The Wall Street Journal and five other major dailies.

Kellogg's Kenmei cereal will enter the rice bran arena in March.

The most chaotic situation is with the heart association's HeartGuide program, set to be launched today in supermarkets nationwide.

"To make a statement a week before the program is out is grossly unfair on the part of the FDA," said Bob Harris, president of GFA Brands, whose Heart Beat canola oil and Heart Beat margarines will carry the HeartGuide seal.

"The American Heart Association is like

Lintas to handle Diet Coke globally

Coca-Cola Co., after using McCann-Erickson Worldwide as its sole international agency network for decades, is establishing Lintas Worldwide as a second global network for the rapidly expanding Diet Coke brand.

Lintas will assume the worldwide creative assignment for Diet Coke, Coca-Cola Co. said. The agency has handled those duties in the U.S. and Canada since the brand's introduction in 1982.

Lintas and McCann are both units of Interpublic Group of Cos.

European Community countries will start switching to local Lintas offices this year, with other international markets switching after 1990.

Diet Coke, known as Coca-Cola Light in some countries, is now marketed in 80 nations. Annual spending outside North America is estimated at $50 million.

The company said the switch isn't a reflection on McCann's creative abilities, which Coca-Cola Co. called "superlative."

Instead, the move reflects the expansion of Diet Coke, which grew 38% in annual worldwide sales volume over the past three years, the company said. The brand has grown so large it needs an agency dedicated to the brand globally, a Coca-Cola Co. spokesman said.

McCann keeps Coca-Cola Classic, marketed in 160 countries, and also retains the company's international "flavor" business, including Sprite and Fanta.

For now, McCann will keep media buying for Diet Coke outside North America.

"Diet Coke is becoming a major worldwide brand," said Lintas Chairman William Weithas. "The Coca-Cola people, in order to make sure that this potential is realized, want to have a separate system from McCann-Erickson working on it full time."

Lintas has set up an international Diet Coke team in New York headed by Exec VP-Client Services Robert Wadsworth and Executive Creative Director Roger Mosconi, who joined Lintas last September from Pepsi agency BBDO Worldwide. □

AmEx begins TV 'Portraits' with Newman

By Judith Graham

Paul Newman's endorsement career starts with a whimsical spot for American Express.

American Express Co. brought its famous "Portraits" print campaign to TV during the Super Bowl in a humorous new commercial featuring Paul Newman.

A second video portrait featuring actress Meryl Streep is scheduled to run soon, capping AmEx's coup of snaring both Mr. Newman and Ms. Streep. The spots represent their debut appearances in commercial advertising (AA, Dec. 11).

The TV version of "Portraits" will become a new component of AmEx's corporate advertising, along with the continuing print campaign and the ongoing "cardmember stories" TV spots dramatizing the benefits of AmEx's credit cards. Ogilvy & Mather, New York, handles the efforts.

The Newman spot spoofs one of Mr. Newman's favorite hobbies: auto racing.

It opens with the superstar preparing for a race with great seriousness, donning gloves and helmet as the crowning touches to his high-tech outfit.

His vehicle? A miniature motorcycle.

Mr. Newman doesn't say a word in the spot, and there's no product mention until the final b&w frame that reads, "Paul Newman. Cardmember since 1966."

The Paul Newman spot "shows you can use a celebrity in a very artistic but powerful way for a product without a hint of exploitation," said Kenneth Chenault, president of AmEx Travel Related Services Co.'s Consumer Card Group.

Jerimiah Chechik and Lisa Pugliese, both of the Artists Company, were director and producer, respectively; Jan Kiesser, served as director of photography. The creative team at O&M: Gordon Bowen, creative director; Kevin Kelly, writer/producer; Tom Pratt, art director; and Karl Westman, music producer.

Unlike the print campaign, shot exclusively by photographer Annie Leibovitz, the artistic teams behind the video portraits will vary, Mr. Bowen said.

The idea behind the spot was Mr. Newman's own, Mr. Bowen said, inspired by a tiny but surprisingly fast cycle he keeps in his Westport, Conn., garage.

Negotiations for upcoming TV spots are under way with several well-known personalities, but so far Ms. Streep is the only one to have signed. □

Chrysler sets Olympic deal

By Wayne Walley and Raymond Serafin

Chrysler Corp. closed the first Winter Olympics ad deal with CBS last week, agreeing to buy a combined $106 million in commercial time for the 1992 and 1994 Games.

CBS said the agreement gives Chrysler half the time allotted for automotive commercials within the network's Olympic telecasts on a non-exclusive basis, without ratings guarantees.

Exclusivity has become a priority for automakers, particularly General Motors Corp., when making media buys. But the premium price usually associated with Olympics exclusivity might have been too steep for any single automaker to pay.

By agreeing to pick up half the automotive inventory, Chrysler essentially guarantees itself at least equal prominence in the Winter Olympics without paying a premium.

The lack of ratings guarantees could be a gamble for Chrysler, but CBS may have insisted on those terms to avoid the make-good problems previously suffered by both ABC and NBC.

Ratings shortfalls caused both those networks to lose millions in revenue and ultimately lose money on Olympics telecasts in 1988.

Without offering comment on the lack of exclusivity or a ratings guarantee, Chrysler executives praised the deal.

"It was an excellent advertising buy," said Arthur Kesteloot, manager of advertising and media relations. "It made sense to lock in the time and the rate."

Mr. Kesteloot would neither confirm the cost nor discuss specifics of the buy, such as the number of spots per telecast.

The Chrysler buy totals $50 million in time for the 1992 Games in Albertville, France, and $56 million in time for the 1994 Games in Lillehammer, Norway, sources say.

Mr. Kesteloot said Chrysler will use the time to "showcase a wide range of completely new products that will be introduced during that time."

Free 'plugs' supply ad power

From news shows to soaps, marketers get mentions on TV

By Scott Hume

Film critic Gene Siskel followed his review of "The Little Mermaid" Dec. 19 on the "CBS Morning News" with the observation that his daughter immediately wanted to go to McDonald's and get a "Little Mermaid" Happy Meal.

That was a plug for McDonald's Corp., a free mention for an advertiser that spends $250 million annually on network TV advertising.

TV programming is constantly interrupted by paid ads, but increasingly, the programs themselves are also peppered with what really are unpaid ads: mentions of products by talk show guests, corporate logos superimposed behind newscasters' heads to illustrate a news story, signage or labels visible during dramas.

According to a study commissioned by Advertising Age, brand names get a significant amount of visibility free, through regular TV programming, compared with what they get through paid advertising.

To find out how many plugs occur during the average broadcast day, Ad Age joined with the Department of Advertising at Northwestern University's Medill School of Journalism.

A complete 24-hour broadcast day for each of the Big 3 TV networks was videotaped, one network a day for three consecutive days.

Those tapes were then viewed by 28 graduate students—with at least two students viewing each tape—who watched for and recorded every plug they believed they heard or saw.

The definition of a plug used was purposely broad and subjective. Basically, any mention of or appearance by a commercial product or company was counted as long as it was not judged to be a paid placement.

The subjectivity was factored in because Ad Age wanted to learn how many product names and logos a group of college-age people would spot.

When director Ron Howard mentioned on "The Arsenio Hall Show" that he lives in a Winnebago on the movie set, that counted as a plug for the motor home company.

When an actor on "General Hospital" bought an ice cream cone from a street vendor and the Drumsticks label was clearly visible, that counted. So did the ad for Marlboro 25's visible in the magazine another character on that show leafed through.

If the students thought the watch on a person's wrist clearly looked to be a Rolex, even if the name wasn't visible, or if someone in a program was wearing Levi's jeans, those appearances counted.

Prizes on game shows didn't count. Brand names or products that students differed in identifying also were weeded out.

In a single day of programming on the three major networks, this study found 818 instances of a recognizable product or mention of a brand or corporate name.

News programs No. 1 in plugs

News programs led the pack when it came to including such plugs, accounting for 44% of the brand-name inclusions.

Next were the talk/variety shows (accounting for 14.5% of the total).

For example, comedian Rich Hall's routine on NBC's "Late Night With David Letterman" included mentions of Exxon, Mickey's malt liquor, Milk-Bone dog biscuits, Milk Duds candy, Pop Tarts, Safeway stores and the Village Voice, as well as Mr. Hall's series of "Sniglets" books.

All plugs.

But the record was set earlier in the evening by comic Jay Leno, the guest host of NBC's "Tonight Show Starring Johnny Carson." Mr. Leno managed to include in his routine mentions of the "ABC Evening News With Peter Jennings," Adidas aftershave, Cycle 4 pet food, Eastern Airlines, 40-Plus Bran Flakes, the film "Friday the 13th, Part 7," Garfield plush toys, Mary Kay cosmetics, the board game Monopoly, Toyota, USA Today and more.

Consumers have been conditioned to recognize corporate and product logos, and most people from 3 to 50 own at least one article of clothing bearing a product name or logo.

So it doesn't take a trained eye to notice that the bad guys are wearing Reebok shoes during CBS' "Jake & the Fatman."

And during a late-night showing of an old episode of "Family Medical Center," most viewers probably noticed the Johnson & Johnson logo on products above the hospital patient's head.

Valuable, free advertising

In a culture and economy where few things are as valued as the brand name, each of those mentions constituted a valuable—and free—piece of advertising.

The argument also could be made that they undercut advertisers by increasing the clutter of brand names on the medium.

Plugs can be negative, too, and these were counted. It happened, for example, that most newscasts on one of the days carried a story about new data gained from the cockpit flight recorder from a Delta Air Lines crash earlier in the year. Each mention of Delta constituted a plug, though not necessarily a positive one.

The broadcasts for the three networks (taped Wednesday through Friday, Aug. 2 to 4, 1989) were regarded, in total, to represent the equivalent of a single network day.

Among the results of the study:

- The networks carried roughly an equal amount of plugs in their programming. The students counted 297 plugs over 24 hours on NBC's WMAQ-TV, 270 on CBS' WBBM-TV and 251 on ABC's WLS-TV. All three Chicago stations are owned and operated by their networks.
- Most free mentions of company and product names come during news programming.

WMAQ's 6 a.m "News at Sunrise" program included stories about possible buyers for Avon Products, trading activity by Drexel Burnham Lambert, the death of a woman when a train collided with the 1985 Mercury she was driving, an emergency landing made by a Piedmont Airlines pilot and a review of the film "Parenthood."

The sports segment on WBBM's 10 p.m. news program included a short item on the Boston Celtics' Larry Bird. The Nike logo was visible on players' shoes and so was the Adidas name on an onlooker's T-shirt.

- News/feature programs such as NBC's "Today" ranked third, with 14.3% of total plugs.

Some of these plugs were for the books or films or TV programs with which guests were associated. But not all. For example, a "Today" feature on Jackson Hole, Wyo., included mention of Miller beer and Calvin Klein jeans.

Brand names visible or mentioned in news stories aired during "CBS This Morning" included Coca-Cola, Corona and Miller beers, Ford, Heinz ketchup and NutraSweet.

- Daytime dramas also had their share of plugs. The Bell symbol was prominent on the phone booths used by characters on ABC's "All My Children" and "General Hospital." A character on CBS' "The Bold & the Beautiful" read Elle magazine. To signal the wealth of a character on NBC's "Another World," the camera zoomed in on his Rolex.

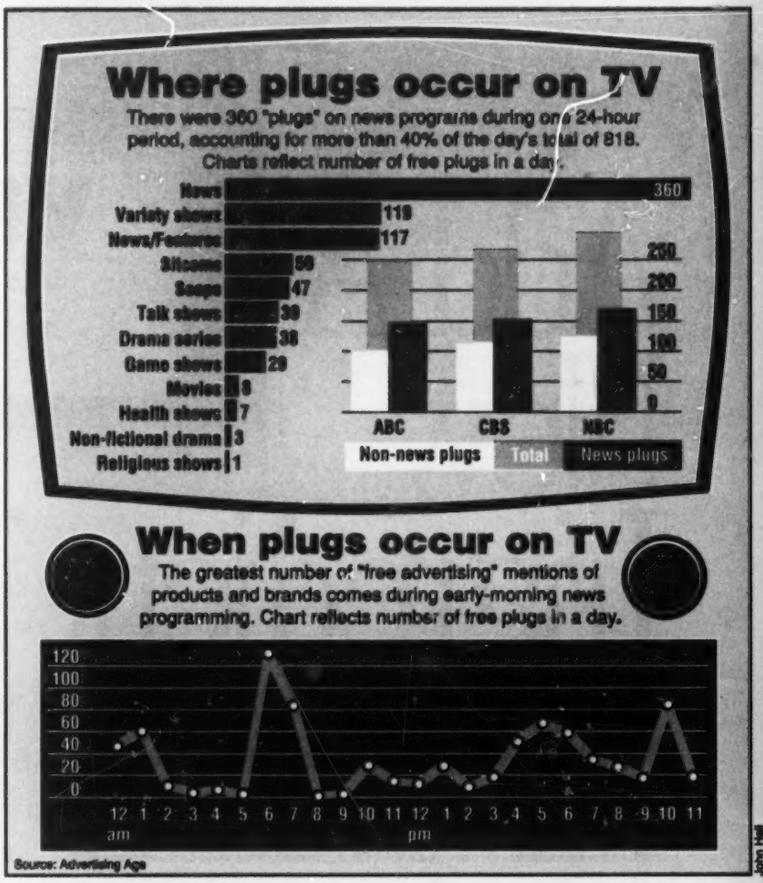
All three networks said their policy is to eliminate or at least minimize the number of plugs in programming.

ABC's policy states that "identification of products [or services] by brand name or the use of brand-name products as props should be kept to a minimum and must be specifically approved in each case by Broadcast Standards & Practices. Approval will be given only when the product reference or prop is important to sustaining the dramatic and production value of the program."

But dozens of plugs still manage to slip through this net, especially on news and variety programs where content can't be prescreened.

If there's a conclusion to be drawn from this study, it's one many of the students noted in their written evaluations: that product names confront us everywhere on TV, in programming perhaps more than through commercials.

Student Karen Davis wrote: "While I had always been aware that there were a good number of products appearing in today's TV programs, I did not realize the extent of the product appearances. . . . There is an almost blatant attempt to display the product names without hesitation." □



Students assist in plug count

CHICAGO—This study of plugs and "free advertising" was conducted with the assistance of Northwestern University's Medill School of Journalism, particularly Dean Don Schultz; Professor Martin Block, director of the graduate advertising division; and Instructor Beth E. Barnes, who shepherded the project to completion and provided an enormous amount of computerized tabulation.

These students in Medill's graduate advertising division monitored the 72 hours of videotape and logged their findings:

Anja Abeles, Tara Afnan, Bradley J. Bonewell, Sheri Brandwein, Rick Cooper, Karen Davis, Amy L. Engstrom, Marla Friedman, Saudia Gajadhar, Moshe Gaon, Brian Hutton, Junguk Hwang, Karen Koehn, Andy Larsen, Younghee Lee, Barry Levine, Carmen M. Lozada, Linda Neville, Pam Noe, Kimberly Oster, Puneet Pabi, Angela Pasqualucci, Kathy Rappel, Robert R. Sullivan, Carl Thompson, Donna Urbanowicz and Jeff Wasden.

The students were invited to record their observations about the project. Among them were the following:

"It seemed as if the producers and participants in 'USA Today on TV' went out of their way to name and show products. (Which makes sense, I guess. Heck, the entire 'USA Today' show can be considered a plug for that newspaper.)"—Andy Larsen.

"Many products get a free plug solely by conveying a stereotypical image of the user. Evian mineral water portrays 'yuppiedom' for example."—Barry Levine.

"I feel that having a character on a show use a product while 'in character' may be even more persuasive than a testimonial [ad]. I find it normal, and it appeals to me on a common-man level, that [the character] Michael on 'thirtysomething' would drink a certain beer. But I don't want to see a full-frame closeup on the can in his hand."—Amy L. Engstrom.

"Watching 'Young Wives Tale' (a 1951 film that aired late at night) and comparing it with current TV movies, the '50s sets were stark. The only visible product (in 'Young Wives Tale') was Lux detergent sitting next to the washer. Current sets have so many products, especially in the kitchen scenes."—Sandra Beck.

"I really do not believe that with the programs I saw there was enough blatant plugging of products going on to consider this to be an epidemic. I believe that shows on TV have a right to use any product in order to set up a more realistic situation."—Rick Cooper. □

Emotion guides BBDO's ad tests

By Gary Levin

NEW YORK—BBDO Worldwide has found emotions speak louder than words when it comes to measuring the effectiveness of advertising.

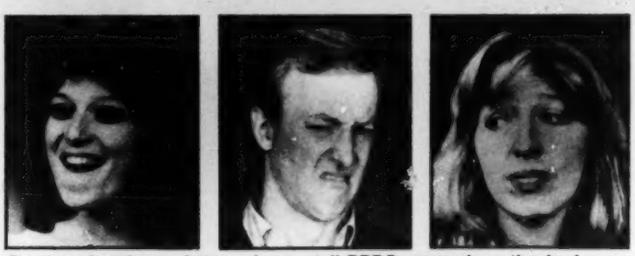
The agency has begun using the Emotional Measurement System, a proprietary device that uses photographs of actors' faces to help consumers choose their reactions to commercials.

The system has been three years in development. Under the leadership of Karen Olshan, senior VP-director of research services, BBDO has used the copy-testing system to measure the impact of commercials for Gillette Co.'s Atra Plus razors; Pepsi-Cola; Polaroid Corp.; and Wm. Wrigley Jr. Co.

BBDO said the process virtually eliminates the inherent bias in traditional copy testing. Under the traditional system, consumers often underestimate their emotional responses because they feel "silly" putting them into words, and words are subject to varied interpretations, the agency said.

"Traditional copy tests have failed to adequately measure emotional response," Ms. Olshan said. The techniques tend to measure thoughts rather than feelings. Other techniques that try to measure emotional response through physiological reactions, such as eye movements, also have met with little success, she said.

Rather than ask consumers to choose from a simple list or write in their own words, the agency devised a deck of 53 photos—narrowed from 1,800—representing what BBDO calls the universe of emotions. Each features one of six actors with different expressions ranging from happy/playful to disgusted/revolted. There are a total of 26 categories of emotions expressed.



By choosing these photos, viewers tell BBDO researchers they're happy, disgusted or unexcited about test commercials.

(BBDO's Photosort system, introduced in 1971, uses photos representing all types of people—rather than emotions—to help identify a brand's "user imagery.")

Here's how the system works: As with most copy testing, consumers are shown a single commercial or group of spots and are then given a questionnaire to test whether brand names and copy points are remembered. Researchers using the emotional measurement, inserted at any point during this process, provide the participant with the photos.

Each person is asked not to write or speak about the spot, but to quickly sort through the photos, setting aside any or all that reflect how he feels after viewing the commercial.

A researcher takes the selected cards and tabulates how often a particular photo is chosen by the 150 to 600 consumers who participate.

In the system, the expressions are plotted on a "perceptual map" to determine whether the response is positive or negative, active or passive. Agency researchers can then compare a spot's effect on, say, teens vs. adults or women vs. men.

"It doesn't tell whether [consumers will] buy one brand or another, but it can say whether it has generated the emotion you want it to," Ms. Olshan said.

BBDO tested the system on an Atra Plus razor campaign that began running in early 1989 with the theme, "The best a man can get." The agency wanted to see whether the male-targeted campaign would alienate women, but it found otherwise. Men were more likely than women to feel "proud and confident" after watching the spot, but more women than men felt "happy and joyful."

"Obviously, we would not air creative that would alienate women, but this actually showed strength among women greater than the strength [research had previously] shown," said Sharon Keith, VP-marketing research for Gillette's North Atlantic shaving and personal-care group.

Although the system wasn't used for Sensor ad development because of the "product-driven" nature of that campaign, it has influenced media selection, Ms. Keith said. Gillette will use more prime-time advertising and rely less heavily on male-skewed sports programming.

Gillette also expects to use the system on advertising for new men's toiletries products under development.

BBDO's creative department has given EMS a welcome reception.

"This stuff gets closer to the way advertising works," said Ted Sann, exec VP-executive creative director. He noted that its main advantage is to validate creative approaches and ensure that "we're pushing the right buttons."

The system can be used to show which age or demographic groups are more responsive to a spot and can thus help select media placement, but the findings won't lead to a decision to drop a campaign, he said.

"I see it less as a go/no-go thing than as a method of adjusting the advertising and maintaining it," Mr. Sann said.

Other clients are similarly—if tentatively—enthused.

"We've always known there's been an emotional component to advertising, but when you try to put it into measurable terms, it gets touchy-feely," said Ron Cox, group VP-marketing at Wrigley, which is believed to have tested its "Piece of America" image campaign using the system.

"Up until now we haven't had any real basis for feedback on whether [a commercial] did elicit a response on an emotional level," he said.

Mr. Cox called the new system "a large step forward" but said "there's a hell of a long distance" between measuring emotional response and manipulating it. □

Pepsi tops Coke in '89 best-recalled ad ratings

By Scott Hume

Pepsi-Cola enters the 1990s with the best-recalled advertising of all consumer products.

Pepsi, which positions itself as "The choice of a new generation," was the choice of most consumers last year as far as ad recall is concerned.

Based on average recall scores for Advertising Age's monthly adWatch survey of top-of-mind awareness in 1989, Pepsi finished on top for the second straight year.

The recall bridesmaid last year, as in 1988, was rival Coca-Cola.

Sears, Roebuck & Co. and Toyota didn't finish in the top 10 in 1988 but made it in 1989. The California Raisin Advisory Board and political advertising were in the top 10 in 1988 but didn't repeat.

The two cola combatants also finished in the same order in the soft-drink category for the second year. Pepsi ads came to mind first by an average 37.5% of those polled when they were asked to name the first soft-drink advertising they recalled.

Coca-Cola had an average 31.6% share of first mentions in the category. Its extension, Diet Coke, which Ad Age recently named the "Brand of the Decade," finished in the No. 3 spot with 6.2% of first mentions.

Coca-Cola managed to spoil Pepsi's party a little bit, however, by finishing in the No. 1 spot in overall recall for the last month of 1989. In December, the top 10 in recall, in descending order, were Coca-Cola, Pepsi-Cola, General Motors Corp.'s Chevrolet, Anheuser-Busch's Budweiser/Bud Light, automobiles (in general), Miller Brewing Co., Ford, McDonald's Corp., Toyota and grocery stores (in general).

AdWatch is a joint project of Ad Age and the Gallup Organization. Awareness is measured monthly by asking a nationally projectable sample of adults to name the first advertising that comes to mind, overall and in several categories, from all seen

International intriguing

As domestic sales lag, U.S. retailers probe foreign markets

By Pat Sloan and Judith Graham

As Talbots Inc. gets ready to open its doors for the first time in Tokyo next month, the retailer of classic American clothing is having to downsize. Japanese women are tiny compared with the average American woman, who measures in at size 12, so Talbots plans to carry only petite-size clothing in its Tokyo store.

Williams-Sonoma found itself in a similar size-related predicament. When the 118-store chain of gourmet cooking and serving equipment moved to Japan in 1988, it learned to carry only smaller cookware that fit smaller Japanese stoves.

It may be a small market size-wise, but Japan—like the rest of Asia and Europe—could provide big opportunities for U.S. retailers that have outgrown the market at home.

The general-merchandise segment of the U.S. retail industry is stagnant, according to Rosalind Wells, chief economist for the National Retail Merchants Association. Ms. Wells predicts growth will decline slightly in 1990 to about 5.9%, down from 6% in 1988 and 1989.

While much of the 1980s saw foreign retailers invade the U.S.—either buying up local retailers or importing retail formats such as Benetton and Ikea—U.S. retailers traditionally have been leery of international expansion. Those retailers most likely to consider expansion abroad are strong performers that have reached a saturation point in the U.S.

"[U.S.] retailers have been reluctant to look at anything beyond their own borders. But some of the newer breed are saying we shouldn't ignore these markets," says William Flatley, a consultant with Kurt Salmon Associates. "They realize . . . Europe is a new frontier. They see a movement internationally and they want to be a part of it."

> Retailers know "they better get their foot in the door before 1992 arrives."

Those retailers, he adds, also understand "they better get their foot in the door now, before 1992 arrives."

U.S. retailers have lagged foreign merchants in overseas investment. U.S. stores have invested $2.5 billion in Europe, compared with $5.5 billion committed to U.S. retailing by European investors, according to a 1988 study by the Harvard Business School and France's Hautes Etudes Commerciales-Institut Superieur Des Affairs.

But that is changing.

"In the last 18 months, names have begun popping up of [U.S.] companies thinking of expanding overseas," says Christin Cherry, a consultant with Nigel French Enterprises.

"I think [retailers] are beginning to realize [the U.S.] market is mature or maturing," says Walter Levy, a principal in the consultancy Walter K. Levy & Robert E. Kerson & Associates.

"And especially if you're an up-market retailer, regardless of what country you're in, you almost have to be global because there's a limited number of consumers [and markets] that can support an up-market store," Mr. Levy adds.

Upscale jeweler Tiffany & Co. is evidence of that.

"When we look at some of the remaining places in the U.S.—next year we're opening [in] Washington and Philadelphia—and then look at other countries around the world, their cities not only have the criteria [for new stores], but in some cases better criteria than cities remaining in the U.S," says Tom Andruskevich, senior VP-international and trade division at Tiffany.

Less tony retailers have reached similar conclusions.

Since last spring, J.C. Penney Co.'s Units wholly owned subsidiary has opened one store in Canada, three in the U.K. and six in Mexico, and is looking at other countries.

Take the pulse

Can 1990 be any worse than '89 for the retail industry? Some outlooks are pretty dim; here are a few categories to watch.

TVs and VCRs . . . Manufacturers seem to have failed to realize most consumers already upgraded from black-and-white Sylvanias and basic Beta VCRs. Electronics retailers beware.

Home improvement . . . Bunker mentality is running rampant. Consumers increasingly want to come home from the office to a haven, not just four walls. Pier 1 and Crate & Barrel are on track.

Appliances . . . Microwave ovens aren't likely to fall victim to any bouts of "planned obsolescence." A slow housing market isn't helping either.

Apparel . . . Stung by the miniskirt debacle of 1987, marketers seem to have come to their senses, injecting a healthy caution about overly faddish fashion. The Limited and The Gap will stay leaders of the pack.

Sporting goods . . . Golf and bowling are leading the couch potato crowd back into a more active lifestyle, but who needs to replace aluminum softball bats?

Born to shop?

PEOPLE TO WATCH

Mathews making the fur fly

Dan Mathews' talent lies in getting under the skin of U.S. furriers.

As special projects coordinator for People for the Ethical Treatment of Animals, Mr. Mathews, 25, is responsible for advertising and marketing the organization's doctrine.

"This year has been incredible," he said during a recent telephone interview from the set of "Hard Copy," which was preparing a segment on the anti-fur movement. "The high point came [on Dec. 29] when Antonovich, a big furrier in New York, filed for Chapter 11. . . . They're learning that fur is bad business—not only for animals but for people as well."

"This year has been incredible," says PETA's Dan Mathews.

Not everyone agrees with Mr. Mathews' gospel, especially furriers.

"According to PETA, people shouldn't even wear wool or silk—because it harms worms—or duck down," says Tom Riley, VP at the Fur Council of America. "I consider this extreme."

Mr. Riley says the fur industry has had to counter the animal rights movement with advertising designed to convince people that everyone has the right to choose.

> "People have an image of PETA as dry, bleeding hearts with a chip on our shoulder."

For example, furriers in Minneapolis-St. Paul this month broke an outdoor campaign that read: "Fur. Leather. Wool. Meat. You have a right to choose." The theme was adapted from a newspaper effort created by the Fur Council.

PETA's most recent ads have focused on igniting peer pressure rather than on the "agony of animals." One ad, which ran in Interview and Details, featured a fur-clad model under the heading "What disgraces a legend most?" It was created free of charge by Luke Sullivan, now a copywriter at Fallon McElligott, Minneapolis.

Mr. Mathews' biggest challenge this year is to keep up the movement's momentum.

PETA has scheduled a Rock Against Fur concert March 28 in New York, the last day of the International Fur Fair, and is coming out with an album titled "Tame Yourself," which contains original songs by top artists that deal with animal rights. It has even recruited Tony LaRussa, Oakland Athletes manager and a vegetarian, to lead a protest at the Seattle Fur Exchange Jan. 28 to Feb. 2.

Plans also include a new ad featuring "Saturday Night Live" regular Terry Sweeney as Nancy Reagan wearing a fur coat under the heading: "Fake people wear real fur." The ad was created by PETA and Schroffel & Associates, Los Angeles.

"People have an image of us as dry, bleeding hearts with a chip on our shoulder," Mr. Mathews says. "We're trying to prove we have a sense of humor."

YEAREND AD RESULTS

Titles post record year despite slow December

Consumer magazines carried a record number of ad pages in 1989 in spite of a weak December, Publishers Information Bureau figures show.

Total magazine ad pages for December were 15,184, down 1.7% from December 1988. Still, ad pages for the full year totaled a record 177,007, a 3.5% increase.

The soft December figures appeared worse because of a stronger-than-usual December performance in 1988, said James Guthrie, exec VP-marketing development at the Magazine Publishers of America.

But December 1989 also was marred by a 12.2% drop in automotive ad category revenues to $69.1 million. Advertising in the cigarettes/tobacco category fell 9.9% to $30.1 million.

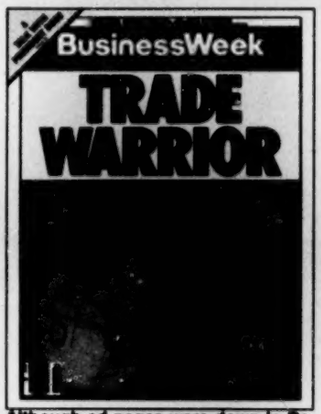
For the year, automotive revenues were up 10.4% to $882.9 million, and tobacco spending rose 13.3% to $401.5 million.

Women's service magazines were hit hardest by December's falloff. Family Circle's ad pages slid 25.8% to 121.84, Better Homes & Gardens' count dropped 20.6% to 115.93 and McCall's saw pages fall 25% to 86.3.

Other magazines hurt by the December drop include Business Week (421.78 pages, down 4.6%), People (413.41 pages, down 7.2%), Architectural Digest (137.12 pages, down 11.1%), Reader's Digest (95.83 pages, down 30%) and Endless Vacation (33.24 pages, down 60.7%).

Even those feeling the December heat participated in the record-setting last year, however.

Business Week again led all magazines tracked by PIB. The weekly carried 4,914.15 ad pages for the year, up 7.1%. Business magazines overall enjoyed a strong year, with the three leading titles in the category also claiming the top three positions among all magazines.



Although ad pages were down in December, Business Week still led all magazines in ad pages in 1989.

Forbes finished the year with 3,905.84 ad pages, a 12.9% gain. Rival Fortune boasted a 16.6% increase to 3,775 ad pages. Entrepreneur led second-tier business books with 1,758.47 ad pages, a 38.3% increase.

At least three magazines in the top 10 finished 1989 on a sour note. Time Warner's People, No. 2 in ad pages in 1988, finished fourth as ad pages fell 1.4% to 3,770.81. TV Guide, third in 1988, saw ad pages fall 7.2% to 3,255.13 as it sank to seventh. And Vogue's pages dipped 0.3% to 3,321.86 as the magazine fell to sixth from fifth.

The newsweeklies were led by Time's 2,733.86 ad pages, a 9.1% increase. U.S. News & World Report carried 2,053.17 ad pages, a 9.6% jump, and had been on track for stronger gains before its ad pages fell 5% in December to 205.2. Newsweek's ad pages rose 0.7% to 2,495.29.

Strong performances also were turned in by the women's service category. Family Circle led the so-called "Seven Sisters" with 2,018.81 ad pages, an 8.8% increase. Woman's Day carried 1,790.38 pages, a 6.2% jump; Good Housekeeping's pages rose 5% to 1,702.03; and Ladies' Home Journal posted an increase of 18.3% to 1,616.16 pages.

Better Homes & Gardens was the only "Sister" down in ad pages for the year. The Meredith Corp. title's pages dipped 2.8% to 1,428.68. Rounding out the list, Redbook ran 1,250.80 pages, up 3.1%, and McCall's carried 1,121.18 pages, up 8.3%.

Sports Illustrated was flat with 2,981.90 ad pages, a 0.1% increase, but still led all sports titles by a considerable margin. Sporting News saw modest gains, with pages rising 1.4% to 586.76. Sport, meanwhile, also was flat with 426.67 ad pages, a 0.5% hike.

American Express Publishing Corp.'s Travel & Leisure continued to dominate the travel field despite heated competition. T&L carried 1,516.23 ad pages, up 7.3%. Conde Nast Traveler finished a distant second with 960.35 pages, a whopping 52.7% jump.

Endless Vacation finished the year down 7% with 332.21 pages. Travel/Holiday had 409.8 pages, up 8.4%, while National Geographic Traveler carried 191.48 pages, up 32.5%.

A handful of strong young magazines continued to post impressive gains. Premiere carried 759.25 ad pages, up 28.7%; Victoria's pages rose 145% to 417.95; Lear's was up 81.4% to 649.97 pages; and Longevity carried 301.33 ad pages, a gain of 682.7%. □

Kodak issues agency challenge

By Alison Fahey

Eastman Kodak Co.'s new get-tough stance on quality and cost-cutting has been extended to its 28 agencies.

"We issued a challenge to all our agencies, including our sales promotion and public relations" shops, to produce better creative and operate more efficiently, said Richard Bartlett, Kodak's director of marketing communications. "We want more bang for our buck."

Last month, Kodak huddled with executives from all its agencies to issue formal "guidelines and quality standards."

The company last August said it would ask shops to be more cost-effective while announcing a major restructuring (AA, Aug. 28).

Kodak's two lead agencies are J. Walter Thompson USA and Young & Rubicam, both New York.

The marketer talked about more than efficiencies at the December gathering.

"You would be surprised at the wide disparity in photographic quality that finds its way into print," Mr. Bartlett said in remarks prepared for the meeting.

He invited agencies to join a "Quality Partnership" program to explore ways "to enhance the quality of our communications [and] increase the contribution that advertising, sales promotion and public relations make to sales and profits, yours and ours."

"Kodak must get back to basics in copy and concept that's consumer and end-user oriented, not product and technology driven," Mr. Bartlett said at the meeting.

"We're very concerned about the standard of quality in our advertising," he said in a later interview.

JWT, a Kodak agency for 60 years, handles U.S. film advertising; Y&R handles cameras. Rumrill-Hoyt, Rochester, N.Y., is Kodak's agency of record for professional photography products.

R. Bartlett

"We are in no way unhappy with the performance of our major agencies, JWT, Y&R and Rumrill-Hoyt," Mr. Bartlett said in the interview. "We're very proud of results of our partnership. But we do see future opportunities to enhance that partnership."

Agency executives reacted positively to Kodak's move.

"I think they laid out some serious initiatives and are asking the agencies to focus on quality," said David S. Kassnoff, senior account executive at Hutchins/Young & Rubicam, a marketing services shop. "They want us to work more efficiently, and we're going to do that."

"It was a useful exercise. . . . It helps the agencies understand Kodak's evolving beliefs and principles," said Fernan Montero, Y&R's senior VP-worldwide account director on Kodak.

Kodak discussed planned ad cuts at the meeting but didn't disclose details.

Mr. Bartlett told the executives: "The fact of the matter is that some of you will be called upon to do less work for Kodak in 1990 and perhaps even beyond. Simply stated, Kodak must accomplish more with less if we expect to compete successfully in the global marketplace of the '90s."

He said Kodak plans to adjust ad spending throughout the year, and reductions will vary by division.

Kodak in 1988 spent more than $90 million in measured media, reported LNA/Arbitron Multi-Media Service. From January to September 1989, Kodak spent more than $60 million. These figures exclude its Sterling Drug subsidiary. □ heard or read in the previous 30 days. Each month, 1,000 people are surveyed by phone. The survey has a margin of error of plus or minus 3.1%.

Among the top three advertisers for the year in each of the categories surveyed monthly:

- Chevrolet placed ahead of Ford in the overall rankings, but when respondents were asked which ad for the cars and trucks category they recalled first, Ford won.

Ford took top honors with an average 24.3% of first mentions, followed by Chevrolet with 19.9% and Toyota with 7.9%.

- The computer category wasn't close in 1989. Apple Computer finished with 29.7% of first mentions, easily outdistancing IBM Corp.'s 18.8% share. Radio Shack settled for third with a 2.8% share.
- Once again, McDonald's earns special recognition for dominating ad recall in its category better than any other advertised product. On average, McDonald's ads came to mind first in the fast-food category for 48.4% of those sampled.

There's a sharp drop to the No. 2 finisher, Burger King Corp., which averaged 11.4% of first mentions. Wendy's International had 9.9%.

- In the pet-food category, the winner was Alpo Petfoods, which averaged 9.7% of first mentions. But Ralston Purina Co.'s Purina name was close behind with an average 9.1%. Quaker Oats Co.'s Kibbles 'n Bits took the No. 3 spot with 4.1%.
- Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co. continued its leadership in the tire category, averaging 24.8% of first mentions. Michelin Tire Corp. was second, averaging 19.2%. In the No. 3 spot was Firestone Tire & Rubber Co. with 6.5%. □

Saatchi floats new print plan

By Scott Donaton and Jon Lafayette

NEW YORK—Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising is pursuing the radical concept that magazines should give agency-wide discounts spread across all its clients, regardless of their volume.

So far, publishers have unanimously rejected the idea.

The Saatchi idea would mark a change in U.S. media buying, where clout wielded in agency/media negotiations traditionally comes from individual clients.

In Europe, media is largely bought on a commodity basis, giving the agencies with the biggest volume the best prices. Agencies and buying services there command volume discounts, buy media in bulk and broker out time and space to clients.

Saatchi became interested in exploring its idea after Heinrich Bauer North America, publisher of First for Women and Woman's World, recently offered agencies discounts for those magazines, industry sources say.

"[Saatchi] approached us recently and I know they've approached other publishers, but to the best of my knowledge, everybody told them no."

"[Saatchi] approached us recently and I know they've approached other publishers, but to the best of my knowledge, everybody told them no," said one publisher who asked not to be identified.

"They're [Saatchi] asking about it," said John Beni, publisher of The New York Times Co. Magazine Group's McCall's. "They don't call it an agency discount when they come in, but that's where they're ending up."

Mr. Beni and others said Saatchi broached the subject during recent meetings with publishers in which the agency discussed its plans to set up a print negotiating team similar to those already in place at Grey Advertising and Young & Rubicam.

Saatchi's team, now being formed, will be led by Ira Weinblatt, senior associate media director.

The print teams are designed to negotiate the best possible deals for individual clients, not agency-wide discounts.

Ad budgets pinched in belt-tightening

Advertisers reduce planned increases

n Advertising Age roundup

The 1990 ad spending plans of a umber of major advertisers are doubt, just one month into the ew year.

Many advertiser, agency and edia executives are girding for naller increases in ad spending an the 6%-10% increases preously expected (AA, Dec. 18).

Budgets in such important catgories as beer and computers ave joined those in the automoe category as ripe for cutting, urces say.

"There is little question that the erall spending numbers are now oing to be less this year than en [what was forecast] as reently as six weeks ago," said ary Stibel, principal of New Enand Consulting Group.

Operating and overhead costs are increasing more than expected, and marketers are looking at cost containment, he said, adding, "Advertising is one of very few flexible [costs]."

Mr. Stibel said the range of ad spending increases among categories could be 3% for automotive advertisers and 8% for over-the-counter drugs.

"We're seeing a marginal increase in ad spending," said Michael Drexler, media director at Bozell, New York. "It won't be much more than 6% or 7%, and it could be less depending on how the economy shakes out."

Some sources are saying "adjustments" in spending aren't limited to any particular category but have been made across the board.

"The networks sold something like 90% of their inventory upfront, but with people exercising options to cut back upfront buys, now it's about 75% to 85% sold, and we don't see any new money coming in, at least not from our clients," said an agency executive who asked not to be identified.

"The networks are making deals now because they are concerned the market might be heading south in the second quarter," he said.

"We are seeing cutbacks higher than we would have liked to see," said a network media buyer who asked not to be identified.

The latest spending changes, if not cutbacks, are coming from Anheuser-Busch, which last year spent about $340 million on measured media with about $325 million supporting its beer brands. Last month, General Motors Corp.

Heat's on Stouffer

Kraft rolls out 'blue box' entrees

By Julie Liesse

Kraft General Foods Group is ainting a bull's-eye on Stouffer oods Corp.'s frozen entrees.

Kraft General Foods is rolling ational with its Kraft "blue box" rozen entrees just as Stouffer, hose "red box" entrees are the raditional leader in the $3.2 illion market, finds itself vulnerble.

Stouffer has been experiencing ales and market share declines nd has just racked up one new-roduct failure—Irrezestibles.

Kraft's TV spots, which broke n some lead markets late last nonth, directly pit the Kraft enrees against Stouffer's red box ne, comparing the quality of ingredients in similar dishes.

The spots end with a tongue-in-cheek question: "Both come in a box; ours is blue, theirs is red. Which do you prefer?"

Foote, Cone & Belding, Chicago, handles, and free standing inserts will support. Kraft is putting an estimated $10 million to $15 million in advertising behind the national launch.

Stouffer President David Jennings doesn't like the Kraft ads.

"I think it's irresponsible for a major marketer to enter the business by taking potshots at us," he said. "Why not try and increase the size of the total business?"

Kraft doesn't see it that way.

"Stouffer remains the leading brand in the frozen entree category; they're a natural point of reference," said Len Lyberger, director of marketing-new products for Kraft General Foods' All American Gourmet/Birds-Eye Division.

Kraft first tested the entrees in 1988 as a six-item line and last year expanded the line to 12 items and moved it into 20% of the country.

For the national rollout, some items have been reformulated and four more have been added, Mr. Lyberger said.

The traditional-style entrees include macaroni & cheese, salisbury steak and lasagna.

The Kraft spots are starting at nearly the same time as Geo. A.

Chrysler shifts buying

By Patricia Strnad and Gary Levin

Chrysler Motors has shifted an stimated $60 million in media-uying assignments among its hree major agencies.

Campbell-Mithun-Esty, which andles the Jeep/Eagle division, ained the most new business, inning responsibility for prime-me network TV buys for corpo-ate ads and all of the auto-aker's brands: Chrysler, Ply-outh, Dodge, Jeep and Eagle.

CME, Southfield, Mich., pre-iously handled network prime-me and cable buying for Jeep nd Eagle only.

Bozell, Birmingham, which al-eady buys print, sports and CBS' 60 Minutes" for all Chrysler rands, keeps that and adds cable uying for all brands. It loses net-ork prime time for Chrysler cor-orate and Chrysler/Plymouth.

The agency continues to handle reative for corporate advertising nd Chrysler/Plymouth.

BBDO Worldwide, Detroit, had been responsible for buying prime time and cable for Dodge but lost both those assignments in the reshuffling. BBDO will be responsible for the "Chrysler Showcase" TV specials and another, undisclosed series of specials for Chrysler, said Arthur Kesteloot, Chrysler manager of advertising and media relations.

"We're trying to focus the way we're doing business and streamline a number of different disciplines to gain cost-efficiencies."

CME, Bozell and BBDO will continue to place spot TV and network and spot radio for the brands each handles creatively. The media shifts take effect March 1.

Agencies' compensation won't change immediately and probably won't change much when Chrysler renegotiates agency contracts, a Chrysler agency source said.

The shifts represent the first major changes in the way Chrysler buys media since Mr. Kesteloot was named to his new post (AA, Dec. 11). It marks the first time Chrysler has relied on a central media coordinator for all three divisions.

It's also part of Chrysler's goal of cutting fixed costs by $1 billion. Mr. Kesteloot's job is to get Chrysler the most bang for its estimated $400 million media budget.

"We're trying to focus the way we're doing business and streamline a number of different disciplines to gain cost-efficiencies in media," Mr. Kesteloot said.

He declined to say how much additional business each agency is gaining.

Chrysler last year spent some $130 million in network TV advertising; $52 million in spot and syndicated TV; $13 million in network radio; and $11 million in cable TV, based on the first nine months of the year as reported by LNA/Arbitron Multi-Media Service. It also spent about $149 million in print. □

Riney joins Cont'l review

By Jennifer Lawrence and Gary Levin

HOUSTON—Hal Riney & Part-ers has popped up as a surprise ontender for Continental Air-nes' estimated $40 million-to-50 million account.

The Texas Air Corp. subsidiary ast week invited San Francisco-ased Riney, and New York agen-ies Lintas:New York, TBWA and Vells, Rich, Greene to participate n the review.

James O'Donnell, Continental se-ior VP-marketing, confirmed those nops had agreed to pitch the busi-ess, but he added the list wouldn't e completed until this week.

Ten days ago, the nation's fifth-argest carrier abruptly fired N W yer, which won the account in 986 from Scali, McCabe, Sloves.

Scali is still thought to be a ontender based on the agency's 0-year relationship with the air-ne. Scali executives couldn't be eached for comment.

The decision to include Riney ay signal the airline's determination to upgrade Continental's image. The airline's senior executives are said to like Riney's work—particularly the agency's success with E&J Gallo Winery.

More recently, it developed a well-received image campaign for traditionally price-oriented Alamo Rent-A-Car, a similar marketing challenge to what Continental faces.

Unlike Lintas and WRG, though, Riney has no airline experience. That may not be a critical factor since TBWA is on the list, and sources say other prospects are without an airline background.

Lintas handles Eastern Airlines, another Texas Air unit. Sources say serving both carriers wouldn't pose a conflict. John Nelson, Continental exec VP-marketing, is a former Eastern marketing executive and had close ties to Lintas.

Wells, Rich, Greene most recently handled Pan American World Airways' account before losing the business last year.

New York-based J. Walter Thompson USA, a finalist in the 1986 review, last week started talks with Continental but wasn't formally invited to participate. Sources say the potential conflict with Mexicana Airlines, handled by JWT in Los Angeles, soured the talks.

Ogilvy & Mather, New York, also initiated some "high-level discussions" with Continental but didn't receive a formal invitation, an O&M source said.

"We could be there if we wanted to," the source said, adding that the agency is leery of the airline's stability and Chairman Frank Lorenzo's mercurial nature.

But Continental had a different explanation, citing a potential conflict with O&M's labor union clients in its Washington office. Organized labor has mounted a campaign against Mr. Lorenzo because it says he busted the unions at Continental.

Agencies will make their presentations in about a month with a decision expected almost immediately thereafter. □

Absolut, Calvin Klein pace a group of advertising that sizzles in annual Ad Age survey of college students

By Anita M. Busch

Nothing catches the eyes of college students better than the naked truth . . . and Calvin Klein knows it.

Calvin Klein Industries' advertising clearly dominates college students' list of favorite print ads, according to the second annual Advertising Age college survey, which polled 884 students from November through January. Three of students' 10 favorite print ads were for Calvin Klein products, including No. 2 Obsession, which students ranked as both their favorite and most representative of their age group in last year's survey.

"Sexy ads always do well on the college level," says Joe Venaglia, president of College Market Consultants. "They grab [the students'] attention on two levels. The conscious level as a consumer and on a [subconscious] level as well.

"There is evolution of sex in advertising," he says. "[Students] are in a questioning environment, so it's only natural they follow the trend."

However, on top this year in the print category is TBWA's Absolut vodka print campaign, which garnered 12.9% of the votes. Several Absolut ads were mentioned, but "Absolut Wonderland," which featured fake snow falling in liquid encased in a shell, received the most votes.

For the second consecutive year, college students ranked the Levi's 501 campaign as the most representative print and TV ad campaigns of their age group.

TV spots for Levi's 501 were the clear winner, leaving second-place Nike 12 percentage points behind.

"One of the reasons the ads work is because they reflect exactly who our target audience is, and they don't portray them as something more than they are," says Alan Jewett, senior VP-group management supervisor at agency Foote, Cone & Belding, San Francisco. "Kids see right through that [type of advertising]."

Larry Ruff, senior ad manager of the company's men's jeans division, agrees.

"I think the key thing is that the advertising depicts the target in a very realistic and relevant way. The '501 USA' campaign is an evolution of the '501 Blues' campaign. . . . Our ongoing tracking research shows that our target market—15-to-24-year-olds—like this type of advertising. It continues to enhance and build our image with this critical target group."

Eric Weil, president, Strategic Marketing Communications, claims his research bears out the single element critical to reaching the student market: "the tone of the message." □

About the survey

Advertising Age's second annual College Marketing Study surveyed 884 undergraduates in advertising, communications, journalism and marketing classes at 15 universities across the country. The questionnaires were distributed and collected by professors at participating universities.

PEOPLE TO WATCH

Michael Carr is working to write a new punchline for the tale of the once uproarious upstart, National Lampoon.

Since signing on as publisher in November, Mr. Carr, former senior VP and advertising director at Playboy, is spearheading a campaign that he hopes will corral the college and young adult market as no other publication has since the National Lampoon of the 1970s and early 1980s.

"Millions of dollars" will go to promotions designed to revive the publication's image as "the thing you have to read to be hip in college," says Mr. Carr.

He currently is orchestrating the magazine's return to spring break after a six-year absence as one part of a campaign to reintroduce National Lampoon to college students.

He envisions aggressive sponsorships of humor-writing contests, campus events, trips and comedy shows, and involvement in illiteracy and environmental protection efforts.

Mr. Carr also will add 10 people to a staff of 20; recruit humor writers of the caliber the magazine was known for in its heyday, when it launched such cut-ups as Harold Ramis and P.J. O'Rourke; and add reader-service sections covering comedy in movies, TV and clubs.

"In the college market, if it's hip and happening, you'll see National Lampoon involved," vows Mr. Carr.

"If we're going to be a natural authority," he says, "I have to tell you what is funny, where the good clubs are.

"The college readers are active. They aren't just going to read funny things; they want to know where to go for their funny diversions." □

Be sure to leave 'em laughing

Collegians smile as they follow the exploits of the pink bunny

By Janice Steinberg

That advertising phenom, the Energizer bunny, has scored again . . . this time with notoriously hard-to-reach college students.

In the second annual Advertising Age survey of college students nationwide, an overwhelming number of the 884 respondents named Chiat/Day/-Mojo's spots featuring the pink bunny as their favorite television spot.

With wit, parody and sometimes pure silliness marking almost all of the students' top-rated ads, humor appears to be hotter than ever on college campuses.

More than that, say college market observers, students have gotten more sophisticated about the kinds of things that will make them laugh.

"Twenty years ago, there was much more of an underground society and it was a lot easier to have shock in your humor, sight gags, slapstick," says Michael Carr, publisher of National Lampoon. "Today humor needs to be much more witty and smart . . . We're in a much more turbocharged society. Sophomoric humor isn't as effective today."

Although its bunny ads were not targeted to students, Eveready is a big spender on the college market. It ranked fifth in 1988-89 with expenditures of more than $1 million spent on media advertising and promotion, according to Strategic Marketing Communications.

Make it or break it?

Concerns over spring break impact

By Eileen Norris

Spring break marketers are cleaning up their act and taking it on the road.

Industry insiders say the approach a company uses during spring break may make the difference in making an impact or being washed up on Daytona Beach.

"What you're seeing in Daytona is a restructuring of spring break. Everyone is happier because it's cleaned up," says Michael Hogan, exec VP of Alan Weston Communications, an entertainment marketing company.

For instance, Plymouth offered vacationers a chance to win one of its new sports cars if they signed a pledge card not to drink and drive. The company also offered kids free lifts back to their hotels if they weren't sober enough to drive.

Last year, Weston touted Columbia's "Ghostbusters II" movie on the side of a building with cartoons.

"The kids like our approach because it's low-key and non-intrusive. Blatant commercialism doesn't work. Kids are too smart to be pounced on by advertisers," says Richard Tarzian, president of Inter-Collegiate Communications, a college marketing company.

Mr. Tarzian says he expects 600,000 spring breakers at Daytona alone. The average student, he estimates, spends $250, which translates into spending on the order of $150 million.

However, those who eschew the scene say the atmosphere at Daytona is not conducive to making a long-lasting impression on the college student.

"The students' minds are on fun and games," says Martin Levine, president of MarketSource Corp., a target marketing company.

"The atmosphere is such that the advertiser gives and the students take, which really isn't conducive to the professionalism many advertisers would like to see."

MarketSource instead promotes what it calls Campus Fest, an on-campus marketing festival held in the fall at 50 universities in which advertisers display their wares and offer samples under tents near college bookstores.

Because product availability is as important as the front-end advertising or sampling, Campus Fest guarantees distribution at the college store, he says.

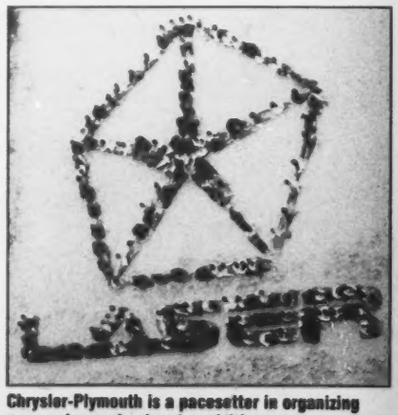
Mr. Levine says part of the problem with spring break is that it doesn't guarantee product placement at the point-of-purchase.

"Spring break is limited in sampling and exposing your product to a select group of college students rather than the true cross-section that advertisers want to reach," he says.

Mr. Tarzian contends spring break promotions—or any college-oriented event—should be just one element of a broader college marketing plan.

"We schedule 20-hour-day programs filled with events [at spring break]. Our business with Chrysler goes on 12 months a year with on-campus support," he says.

For example, InterCollegiate gives away 21 million college folders carrying spring break sponsors' messages at the beginning of every school year.



Chrysler-Plymouth is a pacesetter in organizing more sober spring break activities.

dents love. "There's parody involved in terms of poking fun at some classical forms of advertising," says Bob Kuperman, president of Chiat/Day/Mojo's Los Angeles office.

Joe Venaglia, president of College Market Consultants, warns that not every product is right for spring break exposure. "It must be a fun product that is right for that audience. And you can't sell anything on the pool deck or the beach."

Mr. Tarzian recalls visiting a Daytona hotel where a promotion was being staged last year only to hear 3,000 kids, apparently tired of an advertiser's pitch, chant: "Promo. Promo. Promo."

"We won't even allow Playboy to hand out subscription blanks unless it's under the door to the rooms where we know the men are staying," he says. "We don't want to offend the female guests, which account for 50% of our crowd."

For example, he's warned Penthouse, part of InterCollegiate's Spring Break Promotion this March, that it must produce a "clean program" if it wants to sponsor a contest.

Mr. Tarzian says the amount of positive press generated last year by Chrysler-Plymouth pushing responsible drinking is easy to document.

"The advertising dollars Chrysler spent were received back four times over in public relations," he says, noting favorable press reports on "CBS Evening News," "Inside Edition" and Cable News Network. □

Eileen Norris is a free-lance writer based in Chicago.

"That kind of humor may traditionally have been associated with colleges or National Lampoon or 'Saturday Night Live,' the idea of poking fun at existing symbols," he says.

Similarly, Miller Lite, whose commercials ranked No. 3 among students' favorite spots in the Advertising Age survey, uses a type of humor the company felt would be effective with its demographic of minimum drinking age to 35-year-old consumers, says Dave Fogelson, PR manager for the Miller Lite brand.

"The celebrities [in the campaign] are selected for their appeal to that age group," he says. "To get the joke or sense of humor of the commercials, [viewers] really need to be familiar with who people [such as Dan Dierdorf, Randy White and Joe Klecko] are."

Few can resist the shower scene in "Alarm."

According to SMC, Miller Brewing Co. ranked as the No. 31 college spender with a budget of more than $245,000 on college media and promotions during the last school year.

When it comes to collegiate humor, advertisers need to be careful, says Joe Venaglia, president of College Market Consultants. "Last year Miller tried some humor in a newspaper insert to promote spring break: '4 Surefire Ways to Scam Babes,' " he says.

"It boomeranged. It incensed women. A manufacturer utilizing humor has to be certain that the marketing services organization they're using is very aware of the mood and attitude on the campuses." □ ethically is more important than getting ahead in business"; 85% agreed with the statement. "The kind of career I choose is more important than the money I earn."

"What really comes through in everything that the students tell us is that they are keenly aware of the budget deficit and the state of the economy," says Stuart Himmelfarb, CollegeTrack president. "I think they remain politically aware. A substantial number of them are voting."

He notes that a survey conducted during the 1988 presidential election year showed 77% of undergraduates were registered to vote and 83% of those registered said they voted in the election.

Mr. Himmelfarb said there has not been a notable shift toward political liberalism, however. Although the majority of students said they voted for Michael Dukakis for president in 1988, they were giving favorable ratings in 1989 to George Bush's performance.

When asked about the current status of the U.S. economy, most responded that it was "just OK"; 61% of undergraduates rated Japan as No. 1 in product quality. A majority—66%—also ranked Japan first in economic strength; second and third went to the U.S. and West Germany, respectively.

"Our study shows that students have been consistent in their opinions over the past two years in favoring the quality of products of the Japanese over the U.S.," says Mr. Himmelfarb. "An increasing number of students are ranking the strength of the Japanese economy over that of the U.S."

He says from March 1988 to March 1989 there was a 12 percentage point increase in the number of students that picked Japan as the leading producer of quality products and a 17 percentage point increase in those who considered Japan No. 1 in economic strength.

"We have seen an intensification of their feelings on these issues," says Mr. Himmelfarb. "The social activism of the '70s gave way to the materialism of the early '80s. Now the goals and ideas may be shifting toward a mixture of the two [attitudes]."

Marketers adept at tapping the direct pipeline to students

Clever positioning, creative offerings put J. Crew, Citibank at head of marketing class

By Len Strazewski

A little bit of money can make a big impression on college students, according to results from the Advertising Age 1989 college survey.

J. Crew, which according to Strategic Marketing Communications was 62nd in college media advertising and promotion spending, nosed out Citibank—ranked 15th—as the most responded to direct-mail campaign.

A junior on the university scene, J. Crew began to target the college market less than two years ago after a test on a few Northeastern college campuses. Today, the catalogs have national distribution, focusing on the 500 largest colleges and community college campuses, says Robert Taglin, J. Crew marketing manager.

He says more than 1 million students received a J. Crew catalog in the last school year, but describes the audience as being about 2.2 million students.

"What really makes the catalogs work in the college market is the styles," Mr. Taglin says. "I'd like to say it's the sophistication of the marketing, but really it's the clothes that have become hot with college students."

"J. Crew apparel is one of the fastest-growing catalog lines in the college market," says Maxwell Sroge, a Chicago-based catalog marketing consultant.

"The clothing is positioned perfectly for the college market and the catalogs are filled with good, clean, naturalistic photography that shows off the products in fun outdoor settings," he says.

According to SMC, the company spent about $102,000 in college media advertising and promotions during the 1988-89 school year, excluding mailing costs.

Citibank, the nation's largest marketer of Visa and MasterCard, has been targeting college students since 1983 and has built a student credit-card base of 1.4 million, according to Elizabeth Means, director of the student program for Citibank's credit-card business.

"College students have proven to be excellent, responsible credit-card customers," she says. "Default rates are actually better for college student accounts than for all other cardholders."

Interesting creative helps drive the Citibank campaign, says consultant Richard Harbert, a VP of Creative Guild and board member of the Caples direct-marketing creativity award. "Citibank is clearly among the most creative financial marketing companies around . . . and tactically they [succeed] in developing a message that connects directly to their audience."

Ad material offers students either Visa or MasterCard with no co-signers or parental approval required under the headline "Give yourself some credit . . . now accepting all students."

Ruvan Cohen, area director of cardmember acquisitions, estimates Citibank's total media spending—advertising, direct mail, promotional material—directed to the college market to be more than $5 million. According to SMC, Citibank spent about $484,000 on college media and promotion last year, not including direct-marketing expenses. □

AT&T has students' number

Testimonials have desired effect, gain loyalty

By Jill L. Sherer

Discovering a link between AT&T Co. and John Houseman might not seem to be an easy assignment. But when AT&T asked college students to personify the company in 1988, they compared the communications giant to Mr. Houseman, who played the stoic, unapproachable law professor on "The Paper Chase."

"It's a great person to be perceived as, but we want to keep AT&T on more of a level that students could relate to," says David Pugliese, college market manager.

"Our [agency, Young & Rubicam,] told us we needed a more credible approach—like testimonials—something students could relate to. And we've done that by using real college students in our print ads."

According to Advertising Age's 1989 college survey, students approve of AT&T's approach, naming it the third-best print ad representing their age group. AT&T was the only service company to break into the top 10 in this category, trailing only Levi Strauss & Co.'s 501 jeans and Nike.

Letting students like Liz Corsini and Greg Riley express why AT&T is the right choice for them is paying off.

"I could really relate to the ads because they were talking to us as students and not 40-year-olds," says Cathy Tincher, a freshman at Catherine College in Chicago. "The ads show that AT&T cares about college students."

The company had been targeting the college market for about five years before it began this print campaign in 1988.

The campaign it replaced was unfocused and wasn't working well in the college market, says Mr. Pugliese.

The new campaign is "more credible, intelligent and believable at the college level. [The previous campaign] was a mixture of different campaigns and wasn't utilizing the student testimonials. We wanted something fresh and more focused," he says.

According to a Strategic Marketing Communications report on advertiser spending in the college market, AT&T is the third-largest advertiser, spending about $1.2 million in media and promotion during the 1988-89 school year.

AT&T wanted to create ads that would have a harder impact on students, so the company brought students into focus groups to help develop the campaign.

"They gave us input that we didn't really think of before," says Mr. Pugliese.

"They told us what kind of schools to go to, what kind of students to use, what kind of students not to use," he says. "They told us to avoid the extremes—no party animals and no bookworms—and to use people that they could relate to. Not too preppy. Not too clean-cut. Not too rich. Not too good looking."

Although AT&T marketing executives were thinking about changing the company's college ads, feedback from recent focus groups was strong enough for them to strengthen it rather than abandon it. Mr. Pugliese says AT&T will increase the campaign's frequency in college newspapers, wall media and selected college magazines this year.

"One thing that came through loud and clear [in the focus groups] is that students really like when a company develops a campaign that's especially for them," says Mr. Pugliese.

"They felt it showed AT&T acknowledges their importance [as customers]." □

'U.' emerges atop magazine ranking

But then 'favorite' reading list grows muddled

The best move U. The National College Newspaper made probably was to keep the word "campus" out of its title.

When asked to name their favorite college magazine, 18.2% of students chose U., while other publications of the category seemed to suffer from a lack of "brand" identity.

U., with 1.4 million in circulation, dominates the college market in the number of advertising pages sold.

U.'s ad revenues from fall 1988 to fall 1989 increased 32.1% to $1.7 million, up from three to four issues during that time period; ad pages increased from 27 to 38 pages, according to the magazine. U. is published eight times a year.

Gerald Taylor, publisher of U., says the newspaper does well with advertisers, "because of the credibility of the editorial product, the fail-safe distribution system and the quality, four-color reproduction offered at a fair price. We also have the national, broad reach that's required." Distributed in college newspapers, U. currently is available on 400 college campuses.

Of the 402 votes cast for a favorite college publication, Whittle Communications' Campus Voice, the now-defunct magazine that was folded into its wall media program a year ago, garnered 10.9% of the mentions. Most respondents appeared to confuse CV, The College Magazine with Campus Voice. Only two students specifically mentioned Campus Voice wallboard.

Several students who mentioned CV included in parentheses such names as "College View," "Campus Viewpoint" and "Campus Voice." CV ranked third with 9.2% of the vote.

"On the advertising front, there's really no confusion [between Campus Voice and CV]. Where the confusion really lies is with the college students. Our editors have run across this in focus groups," according to John Glascott, VP-publisher for Whittle's college properties.

"This is fairly typical of the lack of innovation from the suppliers in this market," he says. "U. stands alone, but CV reeks of metooism. It's unfortunate."

Marian Salzman, CV editor in chief, says Mr. Glascott's accusations are unfounded. "There's no basis for that whatsoever. We named CV for 'Curriculum Vitae,' a Latin phrase that means 'resume.' Our format is nothing like the [former] Campus Voice format."

PARTING SHOT

Brand confusion

Is it Maxell or is it Memorex?

College students are no more confused than the general population when it comes to matching ad to brand.

Several students chose the audio tape print campaign featuring the man sitting in the chair with his hair blowing back as their favorite print ad. The only problem for the marketer was that many misidentified the brand it advertised.

Other ads that were mentioned as favorites were the Purina and/or Friskies spot that compares a kitten to a race car and the Duracell/Eveready bunny campaign.

Pictured below are some of the campaigns. See if you score better than the average college student on this test.

P&G's first Soviet TV spot

By Laurie Freeman and Laurel Wentz

Procter & Gamble Co. is slated to introduce itself and its brands to the Soviet people in a 12-minute commercial airing tomorrow on Soviet TV.

The spot will precede a televised performance in Moscow of the John F. Kennedy Center's National Symphony Orchestra conducted by the renowned cellist Mstislav Rostropovich.

While P&G's commercial isn't the first by a Western marketer to run on Soviet TV, it's believed to be the longest ever by a Western advertiser there. Visa International, PepsiCo, McDonald's Corp. and American Express Co. have been running spots on Soviet TV for several years.

Gamma/Liaison

M. Rostropovich

The commercial features several P&G brands, including Pampers disposable diapers, Tide laundry detergent, Vidal Sassoon haircare products, Crisco cooking oil and Ivory soap.

The company now only markets Alo detergent, Crest and Blend-a-Med toothpastes and Camay soap there in limited quantities.

The purpose of the commercial is to introduce the company and its wide variety of brands. That way, when P&G expands the number of products it markets, consumers will already be familiar with them.

The concert is expected to air live Feb. 13 at 7:30 p.m. on one of the two national channels. The potential TV audience is 118 million. The concert is the first of four in Shakeup at KFC?

LOUISVILLE, Ky.—PepsiCo is preparing a major "housecleaning" at Kentucky Fried Chicken Corp., including replacing some high-level regional and corporate executives, sources said. President John Cranor and Senior VP-Marketing William McDonald—PepsiCo veterans who joined KFC last year—aren't seen as vulnerable, despite the unit's report last week of a 12% earnings decline to $28.5 million for 1989's fourth quarter. A KFC spokesman last week said no announcement of management changes was anticipated. National agency Young & Rubicam, New York, already is on thin ice; Mr. McDonald recently said he's taking a "wait and see" position on the agency's status (AA, Jan. 15).

Health ad policy advances

WASHINGTON—The Food & Drug Administration will be free to crack down on food health claims with publication this week of its long-awaited policy on health claims. The policy was finally released by the White House Office of Management & Budget last week. The policy would only allow marketers to make claims in six specific areas, such as high fiber preventing health disease, with occasional exceptions (AA, Jan. 29). There will be a 60-day public comment period before the FDA issues a final policy later this year. The new policy replaces a 1987 proposal giving marketers a green light for making health claims. It never got OMB approval.

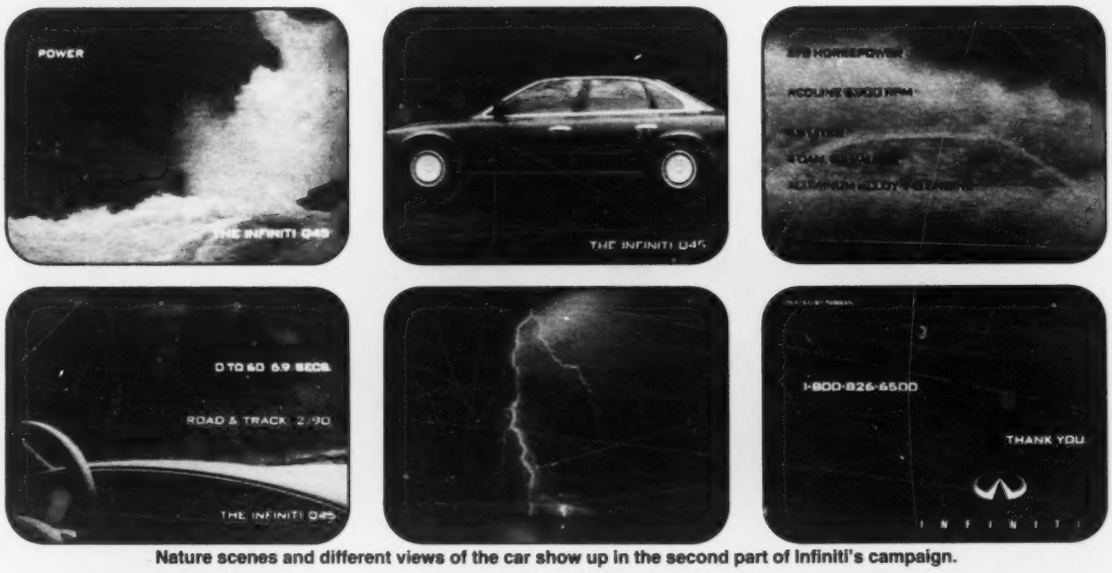
Infiniti finally shows its cars



Nature scenes and different views of the car show up in the second part of Infiniti's campaign.

By Cleveland Horton

The Infiniti ads are changing.

The upscale division of Nissan Motor Corp. USA today begins a new "personality" phase of its unconventional $60 million-plus ad campaign, and it's sure to start tongues wagging again (see Ad Review on Page 58).

"This is an evolution," said David Hubbard, national advertising manager for Infiniti. "We're moving in a direction to position the vehicles better . . . while tying into the equity we have from the nature campaign."

The new-style TV spots, which begin airing in 36 markets, carry over the nature scenes of the initial launch effort, interspersing them with shots of the cars.

But what really stands out is the unusual nature of the spots. Even though the new campaign comes closer to traditional car advertising than the previous

Y&R plea-bargains Jamaica case

By Jon Lafayette

A document discovered at the 11th hour has turned around a federal racketeering and bribery case against Young & Rubicam.

Charges against the agency and Arthur Klein, New York office president, in the Jamaica tourism case were dropped last week as the result of a plea bargain.

Under the agreement, Y&R pleaded guilty to a felony conspiracy charge. U.S. District Judge Peter Dorsey fined the agency $500,000 and put Y&R on probation. The agency also may be asked to perform community service.

A perjury charge against another Y&R executive remained pending, as did racketeering and conspiracy charges against two Jamaicans indicted along with Y&R—Arnold Foote Jr., an ad executive, and Eric Anthony Abrahams, former Minister of Tourism.

Y&R had been accused of conspiring to bribe Mr. Abrahams to win the country's tourism account in 1981. Y&R was fired from the $6 million-to-$8 million account after the indictments were handed down by a federal grand jury in October.

The account is still under review, and a decision is expected soon. In the running are FCB/Leber Katz Partners; N W Ayer; Cliff Freeman & Partners; Jordan, McGrath, Case & Taylor; McCann-Erickson Worldwide; and Tromson-Monroe, all New York; and Burrell Advertising, Chicago.

Settlement discussions began the night of Feb. 7; jury selection was slated to begin the following day.

"As we were all preparing for trial, the defendants came forward with a document which we had subpoenaed two years ago," said U.S. Attorney Stanley Twardy. "It was a conversation between Mike Slosberg, a former employee of their company and a cooperating individual in the case, and Robin Moore [an author acquainted with Jamacian officials]. And a transcript of that conversation was extremely exculpatory, meaning it gave evidence that Klein and in turn Spangenberg [Thomas Spangenberg,

Disney move may slow theater ads

By Marcy Magiera

Walt Disney Co.'s move to stop in-theater advertising is causing media buyers to rethink their use of the silver screen.

"We've found [in-theater advertising] very successful, because we've created specific commercials to run in movie theaters," said Richard Weigand, senior VP-Toyota media operations at Saatchi & Saatchi DFS/Pacific, Torrance, Calif. "But this would shed a whole new light on it. . . . It could limit the number of desirable movies" with which to run commercials, he said.

Toyota Motor Sales USA has advertised in theaters for five years.

"As far as we are concerned, as buyers of media to reach consumers, we have sufficient confidence in cinema advertising," said John Sisk, senior VP-director of network negotiations, J. Walter Thompson, New York. "But now we will certainly keep an eye on it to see if [the Disney move] has a deleterious effect." JWT handles advertising for Eastman Kodak Co. and the U.S. Marine Corps, both of which advertise in theaters.

Disney last week announced a new policy prohibiting theaters from running paid screen advertising before movies distributed under the Disney, Touchstone Pictures or Hollywood Pictures banners.

The policy is effective March 23, with the release of Touchstone's "Pretty Woman."

"We have been told repeatedly by moviegoers that they do not want and will not tolerate commercial intrusion in movie theaters," Richard Cook, president of Disney's Buena Vista Pictures Distribution, said in a statement.

"Bottom line, the marketplace should decide whether or not advertising belongs in movie theaters."

"With this new policy, we are seeking the help of exhibition in giving the ticket buyers what they want and further differentiating the theatrical motion picture experience from that which they can experience in their own homes," he said.

Exempted from Disney's policy are theatrical trailers, slides projected during intermission and ads for approved charitable purposes.

It's still unclear whether the other major studios will support Disney's policy.

Columbia Pictures Entertainment, Paramount Pictures Corp. and 20th Century Fox Film Corp. all refused comment. Universal Pictures and MGM/UA didn't return calls.

Screenvision Cinema Network, a 5,700-screen system that places the bulk of advertising in U.S. theaters, is expected to be effected most by the Disney policy.

Screenvision executives last week defended the commercials' entertainment value and insisted consumers are in favor of in-theater advertising.

"Bottom line, the marketplace should decide whether or not advertising belongs in movie theaters," Terry Laughren, Screenvision chairman-ceo said in a statement. "And from the reactions we get from advertisers, exhibitors and, most importantly, audiences, the answer is a resounding 'yes.' "

Screenvision sold about $25 million in ad time in 1989. It charges advertisers $20,000 per thousand viewers for a 60-second spot or $600,000 to $700,000 for a 28-day flight, for which it guarantees 31 million viewers.

Cineplex Odeon Corp., which runs ads on its 1,800-plus screens in North America, wouldn't comment. □

Murdoch salon plan set

By Scott Donaton

News Corp.'s Murdoch Magazines plans to launch an ad-supported video network for beauty salons.

The Salon Network, to make its debut in June, is a series of videocassettes distributed to beauty salons equipped with their own TVs and VCRs. The featured editorial material will come from Murdoch publications.

This is the latest attempt by a media company to reach a captive audience in an uncluttered advertising environment. The idea was pioneered by Whittle Communications, which is planning TV programming for physicians' waiting rooms and school classrooms.

But Murdoch's system will face competition from a host of magazines created specifically for beauty salon customers, including one being prepared by Whittle.

Salon Network will be tested in more than 3,000 salons nationwide. Murdoch will distribute three every-other-monthly, two-hour videocassettes this year; salon owners will be required to air them at least twice daily.

Each two-hour tape will have a maximum of 30 minutes of ad time.

In 1991, the project will expand to 5,000 to 7,000 salons and its frequency will increase to monthly.

Each cassette will feature three to four separate programs focused on such topics as health, beauty and fashion. Material for the programs will be drawn from various Murdoch titles.

The tapes will carry general consumer advertising as well as ads for beauty and haircare products available only in salons.

"We're targeting the fairly large amount of time available to salon customers," said Phillip Cassidy, director of special projects for Murdoch Magazines. "The time women spend in beauty salons is the best and most appropriate time to reach them. They're relaxed, comfortable and indulging in themselves."

R. Murdoch

Murcoch is taking several steps to avoid much of the controversy stirred by similar Whittle projects. Unlike Whittle, Salon Network's cost-per-unit is said to be relatively low and the system won't lock advertisers into long-term commitments. And, unlike Whittle, Murdoch won't try to limit the number of competing media vehicles in salons.

Murdoch also said it will provide advertisers in-depth audience research after the test is completed. Advertisers in Whittle's Special Reports have complained of the lack of adequate audience research (see story on Page 54).

Those participating in the test will pay $20,000 per 30-second unit. Mr. Cassidy said he expects a total of 2.4 million impressions per tape for a cost-per-thousand of $8.33.

When the network expands next year, the cost-per-spot will more than double to between $40,000 and $50,000 with the added distribution, he said. Ad time will be sold spot by spot.

The system primarily will target beauty and fashion advertisers, "but we expect interest in everything from credit cards to automobiles," Mr. Cassidy said.

Media buyers for the most part were enthusiastic about the project as an ad vehicle.

"Obviously, captive audiences have been identified as something advertisers want," said Alan Jurmain, exec VP-media director, Scali, McCabe, Sloves, New York.

"This is the hot thing, finding these audiences and sticking media in front of them."

Whittle is planning to launch American Style magazine later this year or in 1991. The national beauty salon book would replace the company's Southern Style. That magazine, launched in 1987, folded last year after its sole sponsor, Procter & Gamble Co., backed out.

Agency sources said American Style will carry multiple sponsors; Whittle executives refused comment.

In March, Communications Venture Group will unveil Confetti, six themed, every-other-monthly magazines that will be distributed primarily through department store salons. It will be launched in 4,000 shops.

Advertisers' minimum commitment is 18 pages per year at $540,000.

Confetti and American Style will compete against 2-year-old Cameo, an oversized trade/consumer every-other-monthly from Pygmalion Publications. □

Missing the language ghetto

Advertising in Spanish reaches a crossroads

By Ed Fitch

Christmastime '89, and Jose Bohorquez has decided a microwave is the perfect gift for his daughter.

The first generation immigrant from Medellin, Colombia, who speaks primarily Spanish at both home and work, doesn't turn to Spanish media for hints on what brand to buy. Mr. Bohorquez says he doesn't use Spanish media.

For hints on what microwave to buy, he turns to his son, John J., who also doesn't use Spanish media. In fact, his wife is the only one of Mr. Bohorquez's 14-member household, which covers three generations, to use Spanish media.

And therein lies the crux of the problem facing the Spanish-language advertising and media market, one that raises serious questions concerning its long-term potential.

As the immigrant generation ages and its sons and daughters are reared as U.S. citizens, learn English in U.S. schools, speak English—or even Spanish like Mr. Bohorquez—in the workplace, will the market survive the population boom that spawned it?

Certainly. Immigration patterns from Mexico and Central and South America show no signs of abating, providing Spanish-language media, agencies and corporate America with a steady influx of consumers who seek information and entertainment primarily in Spanish.

But this phenomenon creates what could be termed a Spanish-language advertising ghetto, comprised of lower-income prospects that advertisers consider suitable targets only for basic, need-driven products.

An intensifying push by Spanish-language media to target high-ticket advertisers has met with limited success.

When asked to reveal what categories of advertisers are on their hit lists, Univision Network's Senior VP-Sales Raul Torano and Telemundo Group's Senior VP-Marketing and Sales Gary McBride offer virtually the same list as did John Pero when asked the same question four years ago as the head of Univision's sales team. The targets remain: automobiles, cosmetics, financial services—even more package goods.

A canvass of Spanish-language agency heads, discussing growth potential for this year (AA, Dec. 18), reveals they are pinning their hopes on increased spending by existing Hispanic market advertisers, rather than from new clients that fueled the market's growth in previous years.

The danger of that approach rests in what Richard Dillon, president of Mendoza, Dillon & Asociados, calls the "$1 million ceiling."

In a speech last October at the Advertising Age 1989 Hispanic Media and Marketing Conference, Mr. Dillon told an audience comprised of Hispanic media, agency and advertisers that client companies see $1 million as the maximum needed to promote a brand effectively in the market.

Interpreting corporate spending reports from Hispanic Business indicates leading Hispanic market advertisers—with one notable exception—are not about to push spending levels significantly higher. In fact, they indicate the market has stalled.

The top 10 Hispanic market advertisers last year—a company had to spend only $4.6 million to qualify for this distinction—spent $86.8 million in 1989, up 11% from the previous year.

Eliminate from the computation Procter & Gamble Co.—the market's leading advertiser, which boosted its '89 budget 40.9% to $29.3 million—and the combined spending of the remaining top 10 advertisers rose

And Galavision makes three

Azcarraga back in the hunt for the multimillion-dollar Spanish-language TV game in a battle that some see getting ugly

By Anne Moncreiff Arrarte

OUTLOOK TV

Sports may be Emilio Azcarraga's latest hobby, but TV is clearly his passion.

While his The National daily sports newspaper attempts to win over U.S. sports fans, the revamping of his Galavision Network promises to throw the Spanish-language TV business into turmoil.

On March 1, Galavision will begin its expansion from a basic cable network—with part-time broadcast affiliate KWHY-TV, Los Angeles—to a regional broadcast network serving Hispanics in California, Texas, Arizona, New Mexico and Illinois.

Mr. Azcarraga, who owns Mexican media conglomerate Televisa and its U.S. subsidiary, Univisa Inc., apparently has been champing at the bit to charge back into the Spanish-language network TV business following his sale of Univision Network to Hallmark Cards for $286 million: The two-year, no-compete agreement he signed with Hallmark expires this month.

Galavision now takes on both Univision and Telemundo Group, leading industry watchers to wonder whether the market can grow to support a third network player. What appears more likely is a bitter battle for audience share and the $119.6 million spent in Spanish-language network TV in 1989, according to Hispanic Business.

Backed by Televisa's formidable financing and programming, Galavision steps into the fray at a particularly opportune time.

Market-leading Univision suddenly has revealed Achilles' heels. Early this month, it failed to make interest payments of about $10 million, citing a cash-flow problem. The network also was hit by a strong ratings performance by Telemundo in Strategy Research Corp.'s November 1989 sweeps.

Because Telemundo's recent surge came primarily at Univision's expense, it indicates the three networks will fight for the same advertiser dollar.

Univisa President Fernando Diez Barroso disagrees, saying when KWHY entered the Los Angeles market last April, the total number of households watching Spanish-language TV increased.

That gain shows Galavision's entrance will not have a negative impact on the other networks, he says.

Galavision's arrival might be beneficial, says J. William Grimes, president-ceo of Univision Holdings. "We now have a model in Los Angeles of what happens [with three of us] in a market. According to Arbitron, the combined share of viewing has grown. If Galavision adds viewership to Spanish-language TV, that's good."

Henry Silverman, former Telemundo president-ceo—he resigned to join investment banker Blackstone Group on Feb. 2—is slightly more guarded.

"I don't think Galavision is necessarily bad news," he says. "Telemundo has always anticipated competition. We never thought we and Univision would end up alone."

Meg Bernot, VP-media director, Publicidad Siboney, New York, challenges the assumption the viewing audience will grow.

She analyzed the shifts in the Spanish-language network audience over the past four sweeps periods—when Telemundo was adding second stations to many markets for the first time—and found very little growth in the two networks' audience as a percentage of total TV viewing.

"There probably will be a fragmentation of the existing audience among the three," Ms. Bernot says.

Despite Mr. Diez Barroso's magnanimous statement concerning his competitors, Galavision appears to be poised to eat Telemundo's lunch.

Ms. Bernot discovered that Telemundo, while programming the No. 1 stations in both Los Angeles and Chicago, is extremely vulnerable to a strong challenge in those markets. "Chicago viewing represents 14% of its audience and Los Angeles is another 37%," she says. "That's not very good news for them."

As goes Telemundo's performance in those two markets, so goes the network. And Galavision —through Televisa and its Protele distribution arm—is programming specifically for predominantly Mexican-American markets such as Los Angeles and Chicago.

Doug Goodman

First-run programming at KWHY excites Univisa President Fernando Diez Barroso.

The battle lines are being drawn, with both Telemundo and Univision banking on an assimilated Hispanic community and investing heavily in U.S.-produced programming.

The fight may well get ugly. "The premise of Mexican programming doesn't fly on a big scale," says one competing network executive.

"Televisa's ego is so big they believe all Mexican-Americans will watch what they watched in Mexico; that ignores the reality in the U.S."

"Televisa's ego is so big they believe all Mexican-Americans will watch what they watched in Mexico; that ignores the reality that in the U.S. there is a choice. Life changes once people get here. Even in Los Angeles, Galavision is a solid third."

Mr. Diez Barroso credits KWHY's third-place showing to it having run only "reruns of reruns that have aired on the other two networks." Beginning next month, KWHY will be programmed with first-run novelas, news, entertainment, information, sports and movies produced by Televisa.

A programming agreement with Univision gives it first option on 50% of Televisa's U.S.-distributed first-run programming. However, Televisa creates six hours of first-run novelas daily, leaving Galavision to choose from the remaining first-run products.

"Galavision has a tremendous advantage in terms of programming," says Ms. Bernot.

Buyers are watching Galavision with interest and an open mind. Even without first-run programming, "they're doing quite respectably in Los Angeles," says Nancy Tellet, VP-media director, Conill Advertising, New York.

The niche market concept of the Galavision network, she adds, could be very successful. "On a local level, we will purchase if the [demographics] are correct.

"On a network buy, a lot will depend on Galavision's performance as a network. But anyone who puts out a good product for the Hispanic market, and markets it well, will succeed," she says.

Still, both Univision and Telemundo are moving in another direction. "Our experience is that using all Mexican programming does not work," says Univision President Joaquin Blaya. Programming must be a blend of novelas from Latin America and locally produced programs appealing to bilingual Hispanics, he says.

Mr. Silverman agrees, saying the network is up to 45% U.S.-produced programming, and ratings have grown 61%.

Mr. Diez Barroso counters that the two networks are simply doing what they must as a national service: Program for the masses and across nationalities. He maintains this programming is less effective because it loses some national ethnicity in the process.

"We're talking about leisure time when watching TV. And we're talking about being at home," he says. "I'm a U.S. Hispanic by definition, but when I'm home, I am a Mexican."

Cost also is a problem for the networks relying on U.S.-produced programming. "When we buy or produce in the U.S., it costs significantly more than what we can get out of Latin America," says Mr. Grimes.

The cost factor could become an issue for Univision following its interest payment shortfall. Emma Carrasco, VP, director-communications and advertising, says the company's debt will be restructured and it will have no impact on programming plans. "It's business as usual," she says.

Mr. Grimes adds that U.S. programming is worth the cost. "Advertisers tell us they want their ads run in programs that look modern and address the needs of the U.S. Hispanic market."

Mr. Diez Barroso says if U.S.-produced programming costs are four times higher than picking up available Latin American products, ratings for those shows should be four time higher to break even. "And we're not seeing that happen," he says.

Ms. Bernot says Galavision may give Telemundo fits before all is said and done. "Five years down the road," she says, "my gut reaction is Univision will have about a 50% share of audience and the other half will be split between Telemundo and Galavision." □

New York, Colorado scrutinize scanners

By Nan O'Neal

Retailers may think the customer's always right, but the scanner isn't.

Electronic checkout scanners are under scrutiny in Colorado and New York, where the state departments of agriculture are taking measures to protect consumers from pricing errors. Studies in the two states found scanners made pricing errors on 0.4% to 7.4% of items scanned.

As a result, the Colorado Department of Agriculture has begun monitoring scanners just as it regulates food retailer scales.

And the New York Department of Agriculture has extended through June 1991 a regulation requiring retailers to put prices on all individual items. The regulation was set to expire in December 1989, but consumer complaints about scanner errors prompted the state's study.

Research company executives say they're concerned when a scanned price differs from a posted shelf price.

"We're very interested in price accuracy," said Ken Silvers, VP-systems and production/advertising at Arbitron/SAMI. Marketers tracking promotions are concerned with consumers' sensitivity to price, which can be affected by scanner price errors.

Arbitron watches for erratic changes in a product's historic price, as well as possible errors in product movement, and contacts retailers when it detects errors. Most errors are probably caused by checkers misusing scanner equipment, Mr. Silver said.

The InfoScan service of Information Resources Inc. has found pricing errors occur 2% of the time by following a history of scanned prices rather than shelf prices, said Magid Abraham, group president-marketing and product development at the company. InfoScan tracks scanner information from 2,700 grocery stores across the U.S.

New York monitored grocer scanners during October and November and found 32 out of the 33 food stores surveyed had at least two to eight errors per 500 items, an error rate of 0.4% to 1.6% per order, said Mary Ann Waters, agriculture department public affairs information specialist.

Colorado's three-week January survey monitored scanning equipment in 197 discount department stores, grocery store chains and independent grocers. It found errors occurred in discount stores on 7.4% of tallies, with overcharges averaging $2.66; in independent grocery stores, 4.2%; and in grocery chain outlets, 1.6% with average overcharges of 35¢ for all grocers.

The errors are probably caused by careless or tardy entry of price changes in stores' computers, said Steven Horn, Colorado commissioner of agriculture. □

Solve an attitude problem

By Laurie Freeman

A research method devised by new-products consultancy Kane Bortree & Associates could make every product a star.

STAR—Segmentation Through Attitudinal Restructuring—is designed to help marketers avoid new products that are indistinguishable from competitors'.

The new method uses consumer attitudes rather than traditional demographic segmentation as the basis for new-product concepts and strategies. The company contends people's attitudes on themselves, their health, their homes and other areas are better indicators than age, sex and income when it comes to determining what consumers want.

"Traditional segmentation isn't specific to a product category. With STAR, we start with a category and group consumers by the different attitudes that drive their purchasing behavior," said Chet Kane, president of the New York-based company.

Coca-Cola Foods used STAR to refine marketing for pulp-free Minute Maid.

STAR "is a system for predicting what the consumer is likely to do in the future, not study past events. Our goal is to help marketers identify trends and develop products that can hold market share over time," Mr. Kane said.

Participants in focus groups are asked questions about their attitudes on a variety of subjects; their responses are analyzed for clues on developing brand strategies or new products.

Coca-Cola Foods used STAR to refine marketing for Minute Maid Pulp Free orange juice, introduced last year.

"Given the high costs of new-product introductions, slotting allowances and packaging design, we need to know how consumers will react to products in order [for us] to spend money in the proper way. Trying to operate without consumer attitude research is like trying to drive without a roadmap," said Dan Schafer, Coca-Cola Foods manager of communications.

He said research showed a significant number of consumers prefer pulp-free juice—some even strained it. This finding prompted the No. 1 orange juice marketer to develop Pulp Free.

Procter & Gamble Co. is using STAR on several projects including marketing Ivory soap. P&G's use of STAR with focus groups confirmed "some quantitative research we already had done independently," said Brand Manager Dave Palfernier. □

A-B tries to bolster Bud, Bud Light

By Ira Teinowitz

Anheuser-Busch has made changes in the Budweiser and Bud Light ad campaigns in the face of bad news about its two main brews.

Last year brought an end to Budweiser's 14-year growth streak and saw Bud Light's growth rate cut in half.

On the Super Bowl telecast Jan. 28, A-B introduced a new theme line for its flagship brand, "Nothing beats a Bud," supplanting the 10-year-old "This Bud's for you."

The company said the change has nothing to do with Budweiser's stagnating sales.

"We felt it was time for a fresh look," said Tom Sharbaugh, Budweiser group brand director.

Although the new theme from D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles, St. Louis, will generally replace "This Bud's for you," the old theme will be used occasionally, he said.

As for Bud Light, the brand's growth rate fell to 9.4%, down from 18.5% in 1988. And that was half the 18% growth rate for rival Coors Light from Adolph Coors Co.

Coors, in fact, is claiming Coors Light has passed Bud Light as No. 3 behind Budweiser and Miller Lite from Miller Brewing Co. A-B officials privately disputed the claim.

Already, Bud Light has rushed to make some changes to its advertising, though spokesdog Spuds MacKenzie won't be brought back in any major capacity. Spuds will do occasional TV spots, but there's little secret A-B has elected to downplay the dog in part because he's become an unwelcome lightning rod for complaints about beer advertising and minors.

Instead, A-B is moving to give Bud Light a deeper imagery and is adding a secondary campaign aimed at young adults.

The secondary effort, featuring a truck that appears out of nowhere and brings along a party, broke before the Super Bowl. DDB Needham Worldwide, Chicago, handles.

"The new campaign is aimed at reinforcing our upbeat image," said Senior Brand Manager Bob Lachky. "Wherever the truck goes, the good times roll."

There's little secret A-B has elected to downplay [Spuds] in part because he's become an unwelcome lightning rod for complaints about beer advertising and minors.

A-B blames many of last year's problems on price-cutting by rivals rather than advertising. The company has said it's prepared to match the discounting this year.

And, despite the Bud problems, A-B's beer volume grew 2.8% last year and its market share was up one point to 42.1%, the company said last week.

As for Coors, the main "It's the right beer now" effort for Coors Light won't change much this year. But more secondary and regional promotions are coming.

Foote, Cone & Belding, Chicago, is the agency.

Coors is expected to hike its budget for Coors Light about 10% to about $45 million, while A-B appears to be cutting back on spending (AA, Feb. 5).

The Coors Light subcampaigns will feature Leslie Nielsen in a continuing role.

While happy with Coors Light, officials are less sanguine about the 19.7% dropoff in the regular Coors beer figures. That brand's 5.1 million barrels in shipments last year is down 29% from 7.2 million barrels just two years ago.

But Coors officials, at least for the moment, are saying the decline occurred primarily in the first half and was turned around with the alteration of the flagship's campaign from GSD&M, Austin, Texas.

With sales down, Coors this year will concentrate more heavily on spot TV rather than network campaigns, said Don Marable, Coors brand manager.

Miller's big success story last year was Genuine Draft, which sold 4.7 million barrels, up 20.5% from 1988. The brand passed A-B's Michelob to become the No. 10 beer.

Genuine Draft is starting to feature celebrities in some of its advertising from Backer Spielvogel Bates, New York.

Miller High Life declined again but at a slower pace—some initial good news for Chicago-based Leo Burnett USA's "Give that man a Miller" campaign.

Also, Miller did well with Milwaukee's Best popular-price beer, which passed regular Coors to become the nation's No. 8 beer. Frankenberry, Laughlin & Constable, Milwaukee, handles.

Stroh Brewery Co.'s one entry in the top 10, Old Milwaukee, slid 2.9% last year to 6.8 million barrels. Grey Advertising, New York, handles. □

GM plans spur layoffs at Lintas:C-E

WARREN, Mich.—Lintas:Campbell-Ewald has laid off 15 staffers in a belt-tightening move prompted by General Motors Corp.'s ad budget cutbacks.

The reductions were across various departments and shouldn't affect any services the agency performs for GM's Chevrolet division or other clients, said Richard O'Connor, chairman-ceo of the agency, a unit of Interpublic Group of Cos.' Lintas:USA.

The cuts represent about a 2% reduction, leaving the agency here with a staff of about 700. Mr. O'Connor said the shop is also offering early retirements and making cuts in non-personnel areas.

Lintas:C-E handles more GM business than any other agency, an estimated $400 million-plus in billings including Chevrolet, GMAC, Delco Electronics and AC-Delco.

With GM suggesting its units trim first-half 1990 ad budgets by 25%, the agency could lose about $50 million in billings.

So far, no layoffs have been announced at other GM agencies. Leo Burnett USA, Southfield and Chicago, handles Oldsmobile; D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles, Bloomfield Hills, has Cadillac and Pontiac; and McCann-Erickson Worldwide, Troy, handles Buick and GMC Truck. □

Chrysler to take on Japan

By Raymond Serafin and Patricia Strnad

Chrysler Corp. and Lee Iacocca are going to take on the Japanese in a new corporate ad campaign touting the Chrysler "advantage."

The campaign, expected to break in about a month, will feature pointed comparisons with Japanese products, sources close to Chrysler say.

The sources say Mr. Iacocca will appear in the ads, at least initially.

The "Advantage Chrysler" theme line also is likely to start appearing in divisional brand and dealer group ads.

The drive was developed by corporate agency Bozell, but the idea itself grew out of the personal conviction of Mr. Iacocca and other top Chrysler officials that many U.S. buyers assume Japanese products are superior despite big improvements in the quality of U.S. products.

"We do have advantages—big Chrysler advantages. You're going to be hearing a lot more of that in coming months," the Chrysler chairman said during a Feb. 13 news conference.

At the news conference, he also announced a fourth-quarter net loss of $664 million, much of that attributable to a $577 million one-time charge for restructuring operations.

Mr. Iacocca is expected to hit hard on the theme of Chrysler advantages vs. the Japanese during a six-city schedule of meetings with media, business and community leaders starting Feb. 21 in Washington.

He warmed up for the tour and the upcoming ad campaign with the news conference and a Feb. 10 speech to the National Automobile Dealers Association.

"Too many Americans want to believe that 'made overseas' always means better than 'made in America,' " Mr. Iacocca said in the speech. "At Chrysler, we're James "Buster" Douglas is heading for heavyweight status among ad endorsers.

SIGN ME, BUSTER

New champ awaits endorsement deals

By Steven W. Colford

James "Buster" Douglas, whose improbable victory over heavyweight champion Mike Tyson set boxing on its cauliflower ear, may soon have some major endorsements under his belt.

Marketers are said to be eager to sign the new champ to endorsement contracts, and Coca-Cola Co. and Nike are first in line, say sources close to Mr. Douglas.

Although a Coca-Cola spokesman said the company doesn't comment on potential product spokesmen, Mr. Douglas would appear to fit nicely in Diet Coke's current ad campaign. Recent Diet Coke commercials have featured celebrities including boxer Sugar Ray Leonard.

Signing Mr. Douglas would also give Coca-Cola a powerful comeback to Diet Pepsi's 1988 campaign. That effort featured then-champ Mr. Tyson, who claimed reformulated Diet Pepsi beat the taste of Diet Coke.

Meanwhile, a Pepsi-Cola Co. spokeswoman said: "We have no plans to go after Buster, but we don't rule anything out."

While Nike executives couldn't be reached for comment on its possible interest in Mr. Douglas, Nike's agency denied it's interested in a deal.

Tim O'Kennedy, management supervisor at Wieden & Kennedy, Portland, Ore., said, "We'll do 'Bo knows Yiddish' before we do 'Bo knows boxing,' " referring to the current campaign starring football and baseball star Bo Jackson.

A spokesman at Reebok International said the company was absolutely not interested in Mr. Douglas.

John Johnson Jr., son of Mr. Douglas' manager/-trainer, said marketers and media were "coming out of the woodwork" in the days after the title fight.

"There was none of this until two days ago," Mr. Johnson said two days after the fight. "We

New RJR brand under fire

By Judann Dagnoli and Laurie Freeman

R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co. is planning to test market a new cigarette called Dakota, targeting smokers of Philip Morris USA's top-selling Marlboro brand.

The RJR cigarette is scheduled to be introduced in April.

Peter J. Hoult, RJR exec VP-marketing, said in a statement the objective is to regain "market share lost over the past several years to our competitors. . . . Dakota . . . is expected to appeal to Marlboro smokers both male and female, and we expect this new product will succeed in the marketplace."

In a proposed marketing plan that appears to have been presented to Reynolds on Sept. 21 by Promotional Marketing Inc., Chicago, it was recommended that this new cigarette—code-named "Project VF"—be more narrowly targeted, specifically to women below the age of 21.

The unauthorized circulation late last week of this proposal, which isn't known to have been adopted by RJR, already has drawn the ire of anti-smoking groups and government officials.

In a series of documents totaling 200 pages obtained by Advertising Age, The Washington Post and The Wall Street Journal, it was recommended that Dakota be targeted to blue-collar women ages 18 to 20.

According to one document, which appears to be a Sept. 10 internal memo from "Ms. P.S.

Warning for Ky. ad tax

FRANKFORT, Ky.—National marketers likely would shift ad dollars out of Kentucky if the state's 5% sales tax is extended to in-state and some national advertising, said Ross Love, Procter & Gamble VP-advertising. "Advertisers in many cases would decide to reduce their advertising expenditures on local Kentucky TV stations and local newspapers and other publications," he told the House Appropriations & Revenue Committee. The 23-member panel may vote this week on the proposal, backed by Gov. Wallace Wilkinson.

GM sets corporate push

DETROIT—General Motors has approved plans for a new corporate quality campaign to start in the second quarter, sources said. Spending this year will be at least $40 million and could hit $100 million depending on divisional contributions and special event involvement. The campaign was created by McCann-Erickson Worldwide, New York, which will work with GM's regular corporate agency, N W Ayer, New York. The campaign aims to address what GM sees as a gap between general perception of its cars and buyer satisfaction (AA, Jan. 15).

Evian readies push as Perrier pulls out

An Advertising Age roundup

In a stroke of good timing, Evian Waters of France is about to launch its biggest-ever ad campaign, just as Perrier struggles with a worldwide recall.

Evian's efforts for Evian and Saratoga waters break next week, and though Evian doesn't directly compete with Perrier, it might pick up sales because it's well-known.

Saratoga is Evian's sparkling water, but it's only sold on the East Coast.

"It's coincidence," said Evian CEO David Daniel. "We just happen to be ready to kick off our 1990 advertising. . . . We have no intention of trying to capitalize on their misfortune."

The company last year made plans to boost Evian advertising by "more than 50%" in 1990 to an estimated $6 million and nearly triple Saratoga spending with the company's first TV effort for the brand.

TBWA, New York, is the agency for Evian and Saratoga.

The market is up for grabs now that Perrier is off U.S. shelves for as long as three months. The voluntary recall was issued in the U.S. Feb. 9 and extended last week to Canada and then worldwide. Perrier made the decision after finding traces of benzene, a known carcinogen, in its bottles.

So far, the early sales winners are other sparkling water imports, such as Italy's San Pellegrino, and surprisingly, domestic sparklers that marketing experts once thought couldn't compete with the cachet of imports.

Domestic brands including G. Heileman Brewing Co.'s La Croix in the Midwest; Evian's Saratoga in the East; Perrier's Calistoga on the West Coast; and Quibell Springs in the South are all racking up sales.

Heileman is hiking ad spending 10% to 20% for LaCroix in the wake of the Perrier recall.

In the wake of Perrier's problems, many competitors are increasing production where possible and expanding distribution, especially in bars and restaurants, where Perrier built its reputation and gets some 35% of its U.S. business.

By luck or not, Evian may benefit. New TV spots for Evian water feature beautiful footage of nature set to tranquil music suggesting that the still water is "nature's gift" to a balanced lifestyle.

In a separate page newspaper ad slated to run Feb. 26, Evian offers 2,500 words of copy to educate consumers about hydration under the headline, "Just a drop of what you should know about water." Both TV and the newspaper ads have no slogan.

The regional ad push for Saratoga features whimsical TV spots that use humor to play up its "tiny, little bubbles."

Others are following suit. Heileman deliberately altered its advertising for LaCroix and is hiking spending 10% to 20%. Last Friday it broke a newspaper ad from Young & Rubicam, Chicago, headlined "LaCroix. Pure sparkling water. Always was. Always will be." The ad also will be carried in outdoor and radio spots as a supplement to the traditional "LaCroix for LaBody" theme.

Adolph Coors Co. is testing Coors Rocky Mountain Spring Waters in several markets, and the company now says the test results will be skewed in the absence of Perrier.

Pepsi-Cola Co., which is testing sparkling H2Oh! in Denver, said it's taking a "wait and see" attitude about expanding its market area for the brand.

Phoenix, Ariz., was slated to be the next test site.

Both Coors and Pepsi said they had no immediate plans to roll out the brands nationally.

Quibell Springs, of Roanoke, Va., has increased its bottling capacity by 50% to meet orders pouring in from distributors in 26 states.

Immediately following the news about Perrier, Quibell got $1 million in orders—the equivalent of a month's orders, said Timothy Greider, managing director of the Quibell bottling plant.

Quibell will ship 300,000 cases this month; normally it ships 100,000 cases.

S. Africa shops upbeat

By Tony Koenderman

JOHANNESBURG—South African advertisers and agencies see opportunity in the release of jailed African National Congress leader Nelson Mandela and other movements to end apartheid.

"This is something we have been looking forward to for a long time," said Bob Rightford, chairman of Ogilvy & Mather Rightford, Cape Town, South Africa's No. 11 ad agency. "It's a move toward creating a market of 35 million people of all races instead of focusing only on the 5 million whites."

Mr Mandela is "like a messiah, Mr. Rightford said. "He has his people in the palm of his hand."

Black consumers' share of the nation's disposable income has risen from 32% in 1970 to an estimated 50% and is expected to reach 62% by the year 2000, says the Bureau of Market Research, Pretoria.

With an eye on that growing market, ad agencies here have been at the forefront in applying pressure for an end to racial division through lobbying efforts, ad campaigns and hiring practices.

In the past few months, advertisers such as South African Breweries, Unilever and cereal marketer Tiger Oats have started to specifically address the black consumer market in their ads. Previously, advertisers targeted only white consumers.

Only about 14.6% of the $650 million spent in 1988 on advertising in South Africa goes into media specifically targeted at black consumers, who account for more than half of total consumption, according to Market Research Africa here.

South Africa Broadcasting has two black-oriented TV stations that broadcast in six ethnic languages, and there are several black-oriented newspapers.

O&M's Mr. Rightford believes the amount of black consumer advertising will now grow and pacesetting advertisers will benefit from being there first.

"Brands that have been prepared better [for targeting black consumers] are going to emerge stronger," he said. "I think it will start having an effect almost immediately."

Ad spending accounts for 0.7% of South Africa's gross national product, compared with about 1.4% in Australia, which in turn trails the U.S., which stood at 2.4% in 1987.

"In a developing economy, we can't expect the [ad-to-sales] ratio to be as high," Mr. Rightford said. "But we can certainly expect an improvement."

O&M Worldwide Chairman Alexander Brody said O&M clients in South Africa are in two camps: "Those clients that remain there and that have never lost interest, which are mainly British and European nationals, and those that pulled out," mainly U.S. companies, such as IBM Corp.

O&M owns about 40% of O&M Rightford, whose major clients include SmithKline Beecham, N.V. Philips, Nestle and Unilever.

"Those companies never disinvested," Mr. Brody said.

"Our company has always been a large employer of blacks [in South Africa]," he added, saying that O&M made a decision at its clients' urging not to pull out of the country.

Whether Mr. Mandela's release

Magazines ranked are either separate titles or titles sold and audited together only as a group. Several magazine companies also offer group buys combining separately audited titles. Where available, figures are audited worldwide circulation.

Audit

number of pockets [containing the magazine at retail stores], we could drop $500,000 to $1 million, but how many copies do you have to sell to support that investment?"

Mr. Kaplan said he's pleased to see Better Homes' circulation drop 1.7% to 8,005,311, though he noted part of the drop was due to a cover price boost.

"Our goal is to hit the average rate base," he said. "We don't get paid for a bonus. My charge to our circulation department is get as close to rate base as possible."

The latest Audit Bureau figures show Modern Maturity continuing as the nation's largest magazine with a 21,430,990 circulation, up 11%. Modern Maturity is sent to members of the American Association of Retired Persons as part of the $5 membership fee. Members also get the AARP Bulletin.

"In general, single-copy sales are soft. I've seen it across the board" at a variety of magazines.

Reader's Digest is second with 16,343,599, down 0.7%; TV Guide is third at 15,867,750, down 2.7%.

Woman's Day showed the greatest percentage decline in circulation of the top 50 titles with Penthouse second. Penthouse's cover price was 50¢ higher in 1989 than in 1988; also, the 1988 period included strong sales of an issue featuring pictures of a woman involved with evangelist Jimmy Swaggart.

Modern Maturity posted the greatest increase in circulation, with Woman's World second, up 10.4% to 1,560,496.

First failed to meet its rate base of 4 million. Ad Director Todd Selbert said the rate base won't be changed, though the cover price has risen to $1.25 from $1.

He said some issues delivered the 4 million base and most advertisers last year were charter advertisers who signed up when the company was offering a 2 million rate.

First plans a number of promotions to raise circulation this year, including what it says is the first U.S. use of a wraparound booklet. In June, the publication will offer a 14-day diet attached to the outside of First. The booklets have been sales boosters for parent Bauer Group's publications in Europe.

The Business Publications Audit of Circulation last week released figures for consumer magazines it audits for the same period. Unlike Audit Bureau numbers for consumer magazines, BPA figures in some cases include unpaid circulation.

BPA's largest consumer magazines (with unpaid circulation noted where significant) include The Cable Guide, 7,744,357 (248,833 unpaid), down 0.8%; Disney Channel, 4,776,983 (all unpaid), up 7.5%; Farmers Insurance Group's Friendly Exchange, 4,686,398 (all unpaid), up 5.2%; Premium Channels, 4,187,693 (new); AAA World, 2,333,151, up 4.2%; Investment Vision, 1,820,786 (all unpaid), down 2.4%; Parents Magazine's Expecting, 1,210,613, down 2.1%; CV, 1,050,715 (all unpaid, new); Travelhost, 892,103 (all unpaid), up 27.4%; Off Duty, 740,747 (all unpaid), up 3.6%; Asia, 702,949 (all unpaid), up 10.0%; and Friends, 678,165, down 15.8%. TV Entertainment hadn't filed numbers yet. □

What Soviets think: A Gallup poll

Soviets prefer reading over watching TV, rely little on advertising before purchasing a product and almost half of them plan to buy furniture in the next two years, according to a Gallup poll.

The Gallup Organization conducted the survey of Soviet consumer attitudes and behavior in April and May 1989. With help from the Institute of Sociology at the Soviet Academy of Sciences, researchers interviewed nearly 1,400 adults in person in Moscow, Kiev and Kursk.

Among other findings: Soviets believe products made outside their country are better, with the majority having the most favorable impression of Japanese products. ☐ ants in from the country selling lace and embroidery and such in the street of the Vaci. But when I start to shoot a photo the lace sellers notice and, as one, they turn their backs, hiding their faces. When you have had secret police around for 45 years, habits die hard.

In the Gerbeaud, a coffeehouse heavy with the cloying, near-sickening smell of sweet chocolate, a Gypsy woman with several children goes begging, table to table.

I lunch in the Gundel restaurant, touted in the guidebooks and located adjacent to the City Park. The Gundel is empty and lugubrious. Perhaps the mad Gypsy violins that play during dinner make a difference. I have an excellent cold wild strawberry soup, laced with cream. Here, as at other restaurants, each table provides that indelicate but undeniably useful tool, the wooden toothpick.

In the City Park, on a large pond, several thousand people are ice skating. It is dizzying to watch, a smashing show.

Across the road two Hungarian soldiers, solemn and stern, do their crisp goose step and present arms before a tall military monument. Unimpressed, at their feet, small boys whiz by on skateboards.

I pick up that day's International Herald Tribune. Lacking the local language, you begin to rely with a quiet desperation on CNN and the Herald Trib to find out what's happening.

All afternoon on TV Gorbachev keeps appearing, looking dour as the situation in Azerbaijan deteriorates. At home we think of the Soviet Union as being a long way off. Hungary shares a border with Russia and there are 55,000 Soviet troops still here, and you realize these people have a very real stake in whether Gorby makes it.

On TV as well, Wales is hosting France in rugby, they are playing tennis in Australia and a European Cup basketball game is on. Each side has one black player so you know this is not the NBA. The quality of play is pretty good.

I nip out in the rain Saturday night for a drink at the nearby Hyatt. In the bar an American, apparently with Schwinn Bike, is being interviewed by a woman journalist, also a Yank. The man keeps saying, too loud, "That's off the record," and keeps talking in some detail about joint ventures. I conclude, without great originality, that most people talk too much in bars.

In one of the Hyatt restaurants a Mexican band, right out of "The Three Amigos," is playing. Is this one world or not?

I pass up suckling pig and dine on steak. No place I've been yet seems to have a dress code. A sweater is as good as a suit.

In the hotel lobby, Japanese businessmen are bowing to each other. I have an impression if the Russian tanks come back tomorrow, the Japanese businessmen will still be bowing.

Railroad I—Budapest-Prague

Sunday, pre-dawn gray and chill. The Budapest railroad station, steel and glass, has no newsstand, no coffee bar, nothing but a fruit seller working from a wooden stand. At 6:45 a.m. no one tells you anything, and I follow signs I can't read, looking for the word "Praha," for Prague. When I find my train and the number of my car and compartment and get on board, I worry this may be the wrong train and I will end up in Albania. No cheery conductor appears to tell you anything.

I am alone in a six-passenger compartment, very cold, and I keep on my down jacket. A plump blond middle-aged woman in boots comes in and plops down opposite me. I say good morning and she says nothing. Fine, I'm going to put up with this one for 500 kilometers. A whistle blows and we pull out, precisely on time, as a little boy in red mittens, waving and prancing, races along the platform shouting goodbye to someone. Five minutes out of the station the conductor appears for the first time and picks up our tickets. Then the passport control officer comes along, carrying around his neck on leather straps a strange littl contraption, a sort of small wooden des nestled against his chest, on which he ex amines and then stamps my passport an visa. But there is some problem with th plump blond lady. She looks distressed an her eyes widen in my direction, as if sh seeks consolation. I ignore her and gaze ou the window where the countryside, rathe flat, the famed Hungarian plain, speeds by very green in the first light.

A second passport control officer come by, then a third, this one an attractiv young woman, using sign language to ask I have any Czech money.

None of these countries wants you t have any of their money when you arrive they want you to buy it there with dollar Makes sense; they need hard currency. pass inspection but the plump blon woman continues to encounter difficul ties.

The train, threadbare but clean, rattle on, the Danube to our left, still small, lei surely. Barges head north and there is ski ice on some of the coves.

Now, out of desperation, the plump blond takes me into her confidence. She is Germa was in a car crash, and has both glaucom and irregularities with her visa. I speak litt German, she speaks little else, but we wor this much out. I wag my head in sympath tsk, tsk. At Sturovo, a small border town i

Retailers, newspapers work off the same page

By Kate Fitzgerald

A new era of cooperation between newspapers and retailers is under way.

Following Sears, Roebuck & Co.'s lead last year in getting newspaper chains to adjust ad rates, other retailers have managed to revamp their contracts with newspapers and push for a variety of reforms.

"Everyone in the retail business is now looking for the same thing from newspapers, which boils down to changes in how we work together," says Joseph Chicoskie, manager of media services for J.C. Penney Co. "Newspapers want to do business like we did it 20 years ago, but things have changed and they have to catch up," he says.

As newspapers battle against declines in advertising and circulation, retailers provide 50% of their revenues; an approximate 7% per year increase in ad rates makes the struggle for lower rates and increased linage worthwhile for both groups.

"We're all watching Sears and the progress they've made," says Chuck Jacoby, national advertising manager for Silo Inc., an electronics and appliances retailer. "Obviously, whatever gains the biggest retailer makes should help improve our relationships with newspapers across the board."

Although no other retailers have tried to negotiate the same type of flat-rate system Sears sought, retail advertisers report improvements in negotiations with newspapers in the last two years.

"It's gradual, but recently retailers have begun to share the driver's seat with newspapers more than they ever did before," says Mr. Jacoby.

Retailers still want better incentives and more flexibility in the rates offered by newspapers, along with more information-sharing between the two sides.

"We'd like to see a new benchmark established that would tie newspaper ad rates to the amount of money each retailer spends," Mr. Chicoskie says. "That type of arrangement would give all retailers the same advantage, whether they are large or small."

At the annual International Newspaper Advertising & Marketing Executives meeting in January, Montgomery Ward & Co.'s Chairman-CEO Bernard Brennan summed up the dilemma retailers face, saying: "What we need from you are new strategies and prices that allow us to do the job we must do, which is to reach increasingly targeted consumers at efficient prices."

Retailers also are clamoring for newspapers to supply market research data that will allow them to better target customers.

Armed with a newspaper's circulation and penetration data within a certain ZIP code, retailers can decide where, when and how to advertise in newspapers, including whether to use preprinted inserts or run-of-press ads. Yet, less than half of the major newspapers provide circulation data broken out by ZIP code.

"For more than two years we've had the capability to target customers and markets through ZIP codes, but most of the newspapers we deal with don't give us this valuable information," says Mr. Jacoby. "We're looking for market sensitivity in the markets that fit our needs, coupled with newspapers' needs, to make them advertising partners with us."

The newspaper industry has come "a long way" in providing data to advertisers, says Uldis Grava, VP-marketing services for the Newspaper Advertising Bureau.

"Two years ago only a couple of hundred newspapers provided circulation market research data to advertisers, and now over 600 do," he says. "By the end of 1990 half of all newspapers should be providing this data." □ ferently. We've never sold like this before."

When the newspaper sales teams do arrive, says Mr. Primis, "we don't get a lot of, 'Gee, we're glad you're here.' Newspapers will have to spend money and energy to get advertisers' attention."

Some efforts have yet to pay off. The Los Angeles Times' effort to target the beer industry, which included publishing a prototype showing how Budweiser ads could appear in sports sections, has yet to yield a beer ad, says Janis Heaphy, the Times general advertising manager.

Separately this year, the Times launched a special ad rate for cosmetics companies, effective April 1. The rate will be similar to the co-op rate, says Ms. Heaphy.

Other newspapers in recent years have adopted special category rates, offering discounts for travel marketers, package goods suppliers, automakers and publishing houses.

Many newspaper executives say national advertisers don't reward the newspapers that reduce national rates.

Emmett McKinley, national advertising director for the Houston Post, says his newspaper would reduce national rates "in a heartbeat" if it would make a difference. The Post's 31.7% rate differential has shrunk slightly in the last few years, he says.

Others say the differential between national and retail ad rates is blown out of proportion.

"That's a consistent irritant," says Mr. Tilis. Eliminating the differential "should not be a goal," he says.

Instead, newspapers should focus more on giving national advertisers extra value through merchandising or volume contracts. "We see it [meetings with advertisers] as a marketing need. Advertisers need more and better information," says Tom Culligan, senior VP of marketing, Minneapolis Star Tribune. "We're also searching for great creative ideas." □

The Sunday Chronicle and the daily Chronicle.

Surprised that The Houston Chronicle sells the two biggest newspapers in Houston? Well, it does.

The Sunday Chronicle sells 228,865 more papers than the city's other Sunday paper, giving it a 62% lead. And the daily Chronicle? It has a 34% lead over their daily edition, and even outsells their Sunday paper by 70,393. Nationally, The Houston Chronicle is the fastest-growing Sunday paper among the nation's top twenty-five newspapers, and the second-fastest growing daily in that group.

So if you want big advertising results, phone (713) 220-7761. One call, and you'll get Houston's two biggest newspapers.

Chief executive officer
H.J. Heinz Co.

Bill Exler

What's on his plate

H.J. Heinz Co. has consistently outperformed other U.S. food companies, managing to wring earnings gains of 12% to 15% out of sales increases averaging 7%.

The reason is Anthony J.F. O'Reilly, chairman, president and ceo of the $5.8 billion marketer.

Mr. O'Reilly, an Irishman well-known on two continents, has built the Pittsburgh-based food giant into one of the world's largest multinational marketers, operating in about 150 countries.

Mr. O'Reilly, 54, also chairman and controlling stockholder of Independent Newspapers Ltd., Ireland's largest publishing group, recently talked with Advertising Age's Judann Dagnoli on industry trends and plans for continuing Heinz's momentum in the 1990s.

Advertising Age: You've been chief executive of Heinz for 10 years. During that time, there have been enormous changes, particularly the megamergers among food companies. Is that trend about over?

Mr. O'Reilly: I think it is curious if you reflect on what's happened—that you've seen a process of aggregation and you've seen a process of disaggregation.

If you take RJR Nabisco as a classic example. . . . When they were R.J. Reynolds, [it] bought Del Monte. And Standard Brands merged with Nabisco, and then

Simplesse budget may surpass $30M

An Advertising Age roundup

NutraSweet Co. hopes to turn Simplesse into a household word, just like its namesake sweetener.

The company declined to reveal the ad budget for Simplesse, but it could be comparable to or exceed NutraSweet's annual $30 million outlay.

The budget "will be very significant," said David Morley, group VP-general manager of NutraSweet's Simplesse Group. "We want to accomplish the same goals [as the NutraSweet brand] in terms of consumer awareness."

Norm Singer, director of research at the company, said the budget "is huge. You will see the name all over."

A major ad campaign for the fat substitute, which last week received a green light from the Food & Drug Administration, will break this spring.

Like the sweetener, Simplesse will be supported by a two-pronged ad approach: the campaign for the food ingredient and a separate campaign for branded products NutraSweet will produce using Simplesse.

Ogilvy & Mather, Chicago, is handling the generic campaign; FCB/Leber Katz Partners, New York, will handle product advertising.

First up among the products is Simple Pleasures, a multiflavor frozen dairy dessert NutraSweet Co. will roll out nationally this summer.

Simple Pleasures will get distribution support from Dreyer's Grand Ice Cream Co., which now operates on the West Coast and in the Midwest.

NutraSweet Co.'s first branded product with newly approved Simplesse will be Simple Pleasures dessert.

Laurel Cutler, vice chairwoman at FCB/Leber Katz and a key figure in Simplesse marketing, wouldn't disclose the ad budget or details on the Simple Pleasures introduction, but she hinted at the strategic approach.

"When you have a real consumer breakthrough, you don't get in the way. You give the news," she said. "Of course, our job is to convey the taste."

Sources say Simple Pleasures' budget will be competitive with a major ice cream launch, which would put it in the $5 million-to-$10 million range.

Mr. Morley said that during the next several weeks, the Simplesse team will meet with the FDA to discuss approval for other products. Last week's FDA announcement affirmed Simplesse's status as generally recognized as safe (GRAS) and approved its use in frozen desserts.

Decisions about giving marketers exclusivity in using Simplesse will be made on a category-by-category basis, Mr. Morley said.

Kraft General Foods Group already has agreed to use Simplesse in mayonnaise and related products. Among other competitors in the $15 billion U.S. market for butter, fats and oils, Borden Inc. and Van den Bergh Foods are seen as the likeliest users of Simplesse.

NutraSweet Co. said authorities in countries including Belgium, Japan, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Switzerland and West Germany already have recognized Simplesse as a safe ingredient.

Mr. Morley said the company hopes to introduce products abroad by yearend.

The FDA said it also is reviewing a petition from Kraft General Foods for a similar fat substitute made from egg whites and milk proteins. Company Chairman-CEO Michael Miles said he expects approval for the product, code-named "Trailblazer," by yearend.

Also under review is Procter & Gamble Co.'s petition for its fat-substitute olestra. Olestra would have much broader uses than Simplesse. □

Pepsi cools on celebs

By Patricia Winters

This just in from the cola star wars: Pepsi-Cola Co. may use fewer celebrity ads in the future.

"Celebrity advertising may have run its course," PepsiCo Exec VP-Chief Financial Officer Robert Dettmer said after a presentation to securities analysts at the Consumer Analyst Group of New York's annual meeting last week in Fort Lauderdale, Fla.

"You may see less celebrity advertising, but we can't get completely away from it," he told reporters. "We may be ready to do different things."

Mr. Dettmer's remark was the first from the cola giants acknowledging the industry's celebrity mania may be wearing out.

Pepsi and rival Coca-Cola Co. have been criticized for using too many celebrities and confusing consumers with interchangeable star endorsers.

This year alone, Coca-Cola broke ads with more than 10 different celebrities; Pepsi so far has broken ads with more than five.

Tod MacKenzie, spokesman for Pepsi-Cola Co., later said Mr. Dettmer contends he never made the remark to the reporters, and said the report of his statement was "totally erroneous."

Mr. Dettmer also said to the reporters in Florida that he had spoken earlier to the head of the Pepsi bottlers group on this subject.

Pepsi-Cola Bottlers Chairman Forrest Clay, contacted by Advertising Age, said Pepsi-Cola Co. executives have told bottlers that Pepsi has changed its celebrity format.

"Pepsi has told us [the bottlers] that they are going to use celebrity advertising as the needs arise and that there will probably not be as much of it as in the past," Mr. Clay said.

Bottlers opposed earlier ad programs featuring celebrity advertising "almost totally," Mr. Clay said. He said the bottling group supports "the new format" to use celebrity advertising in moderation.

"We need diversification of advertising," he said.

Industry sources say bottlers felt Pepsi was suffering from "celebrity tunnel vision" and didn't offer a generic mix of ads to reach mainstream America. Some bottlers felt they've been barraged with too many "big events," resulting in too much hype.

"If a big event is good, it's great. But one after the other, it's too much hype."

"If a big event is good, it's great. But one after the other, it's too much hype," said one bottler who asked not to be named.

Bottlers support celebrity ads that fit strategically in Pepsi's marketing attacks or offer an emotional connection, this source said.

For instance, bottlers are said to like the Joe Montana spot for Diet Pepsi, in which he makes a strategic challenge to Diet Coke's celebrity endorsers to take an on-air taste test. BBDO Worldwide, New York, is Pepsi's agency.

For its part, Coca-Cola said it won't alter its celebrity strategy.

"I don't think we're going to change our approach. . . . We use celebrities when it enhances a spot, and we'll continue to do that," said Coca-Cola USA spokesman Bob Bertini.

Diet Coke hits recall chart for first time

By Kate Fitzgerald

Diet Pepsi fattened its roster of celebrity spokesmen and hiked its ad spending by 50% last month, but it still lost the ad recall race to rival Diet Coke.

Diet Coke landed a spot for the first time on the list of the top 10 best-recalled advertising in January, placing ninth in Advertising Age's monthly adWatch survey.

Pepsi-Cola Co.'s Diet Pepsi, which finished 18th, last appeared on the top 10 best-recalled list in July 1988.

Both marketers broke new campaigns in early January with dueling celebrities, and Diet Pepsi vowed to boost first-quarter network TV spending 50% (AA, Dec. 11).

Coca-Cola Co.'s new campaign by Lintas:New York, themed "Discover Diet Coke," features Chris Evert, Vanna White and Sugar Ray Leonard.

Diet Pepsi's new campaign, themed "The Right One," broke New Year's Eve and features Billy Crystal and Ray Charles. BBDO Worldwide is the agency.

Diet Pepsi's Super Bowl TV spot Jan. 28 featuring San Francisco 49ers quarterback Joe Montana challenging rivals to a taste test wasn't included in adWatch's survey, taken earlier in the month.

In overall soft-drink advertising, brand Pepsi continued to lead Coca-Cola with 34.3% awareness compared with Coca-Cola's 31.3%. Diet Coke placed third, followed by 7UP and Sprite.

*Indicates tie.

Ford was the No. 1 best-recalled advertiser in January, up from seventh place the previous month, and it did so without breaking a new TV campaign. J. Walter Thompson USA, Detroit, handles.

Ford may have gotten a jump-start in the recall race from Chevrolet, whose new comparative TV campaign says Chevy trucks outsell Fords in Ford County, Ill. Lintas:Campbell-Ewald, Warren, Mich., handles Chevrolet, which finished seventh.

Infiniti returned to the top 10 best-recalled list in January after a month's hiatus, thanks to ongoing intrigue with its unusual "rocks and trees" TV campaign from Hill, Holliday, Connors, Cosmopulos, Marina del Rey, Calif.

The upscale division of Nissan Motor Corp. USA tied for fifth place with McDonald's Corp. in the January survey; in November it was No. 1 after the campaign broke.

Ford led the category, followed closely by Chevrolet. Toyota was a distant third, followed by Infiniti and Nissan.

Although it didn't make the top 10, the Energizer Bunny helped Ralston Purina Co.'s Eveready Battery Co. into the No. 11 spot, its highest score ever. Chiat/Day/-Mojo handles.

Elsewhere, Kentucky Fried Chicken Corp. finally edged back into the top five best-recalled advertisers in the fast-food category, bumping Taco Bell from the No. 5 spot last month.

KFC's recent controversial TV campaign satirizing McDonald's, via Young & Rubicam, New York, is fueling the surge in awareness. This month marked the first time since December 1988 that KFC has placed among the top five fast-food advertisers.

AdWatch is a joint project of Ad Age and the Gallup Organization. Advertising awareness is measured by asking a nationally projectable sample to name the first advertising that comes to mind from all seen, heard or read in the previous 30 days.

Last month, 1,000 adults were polled by phone. The margin of error is plus or minus 3.1%. □

Major U.K. marketer revitalizes lackluster Lucozade, Ribena sales

By Laurel Wentz

LONDON—SmithKline Beecham Consumer Brands hopes a golden-colored drink invented during a jaundice epidemic in 1932 by a pharmacist in Newcastle, England, will catch on as a U.S. soft drink.

After a lifetime as the drink mothers served to their sick kids, Lucozade was reborn in the U.K. in the late 1980s as an energy-giving beverage for healthy people.

Now Beecham is trying out Lucozade's U.S. potential with tests in Peoria, Ill., and Boise, Idaho. Beecham's U.K. executives have trouble pronouncing those city names but plan to continue the tests, started in August, for up to another year.

"By and large, wherever we've launched it, it's done pretty well, said Peter Glynn-Jones, SmithKline Beecham Consumer Brands worldwide managing director.

Ogilvy & Mather handles Lucozade in the 21 countries where it's sold, and for the U.S. test its New York office created a TV spot, themed "The sparkling energy drink," featuring a female dancer.

In Boise, Lucozade is exceeding sales projections at 14 Albertson's grocery stores, said Gary Spiers, sales manager of Albertson's Idaho division.

"Normally, we need to sell over two cases a week in that category. It is exceeding that," he said.

The test will run at least through summer, said Carl Nelson, retail relations director at Nielsen Marketing Research Group, which is conducting the test. He said results in all areas are encouraging.

However, retailers in the Peoria area weren't so optimistic. Sales are "not too bad," said Thomas Thompson, VP at Thompson's, a chain of eight grocery stores. "There probably is a market for it. But it is pretty high priced."

Sold in traditional, orange barley and lemon barley flavors, Lucozade comes in four-packs of 8.4 ounces each and costs $2 to $2.50. No ad spending figures for the tests are available.

O&M started revitalizing the Lucozade brand in the U.K. seven years ago. Daley Thompson, the world record holder for the decathlon, has been featured in commercials showing him training for different events and gulping down Lucozade.

As the beverage travels around the world, ads are adapted locally featuring, for instance, a Chinese hurdler in the Taiwan test.

Sales have soared in the U.K. to $149 million in 1989 from $48 million in 1984. Lucozade has become the U.K.'s No. 3 soft drink right behind Coca-Cola and Pepsi-Cola, said David King, U.K. chairman of SmithKline Beecham Consumer Brands.

Line extensions now make up half of Lucozade's U.K. sales.

After adding orange, lemon and mixed fruit flavors in 1986, in 1988 Beecham came out with Lucozade Light, with separate ads aimed at women.

The company now is introducing nationally Lucozade Sport isotonic drink. Ads for Lucozade Sport break next month, Mr. King said.

Elsewhere, the drink is a success in Hong Kong. Mr. Glynn-Jones is contemplating a test in Spain this year that could lead to a broader European introduction.

O&M handles Lucozade in all the soft drink's markets.

SmithKline Beecham hurdles soft-drink rivals by repositioning Lucozade as an energy drink. Ogilvy & Mather handles.

Ribena, a lightly carbonated black currant-flavor drink with vitamin C, has been repositioned to emphasize its natural ingredients.

The drink is handled by Grey Ltd., Beecham's other worldwide agency.

U.K. sales climbed to $138 million in 1989 from $38 million in 1984, when the repositioning began.

"We dipped our toe in the water and launched two Ribena drinks without black currant—the strawberry drink and an orange/apricot drink."

A low-sugar Ribena Light and about a half-dozen new fruit flavors have been added since then.

"Last summer, we dipped our toe in the water and launched two Ribena drinks without black currant—the only pure strawberry drink [in the market] and an orange/apricot drink," Mr. King said.

Mr. Glynn-Jones sees some potential for Ribena in the U.S., where it's available on a limited basis, despite the unusual flavor.

"People don't particularly understand black currants," he said. "There's a good market for cranberries in the U.S. I don't see why a good market can't be generated for black currants."

The company, formed last July through the merger of Beecham Group here and U.S.-based SmithKline Beckman Corp., plans to increase its overall U.K. ad budget by 19% to $80 million this year despite forecasts of no growth for the U.K. ad industry, Mr. King said. □

Animal uproar

When testing for human health and safety is the issue, beauty-aids marketers struggle to define 'humane'

Kurt Mitchell

By Laurie Freeman

Two members of the cosmetics and toiletries industry gathering this week in Boca Raton, Fla., the angry sign-carrying demonstrators will be a familiar sight.

People for the Ethical Treatment of Animals, a leading animal-rights activist group, plans another "major demonstration" at the annual Cosmetic, Toiletry & Fragrance Association meeting.

The PETA demonstration is but the latest installment in a long-running series to pressure marketers to end animal testing.

"Concern about treatment of animals . . . is related to a growing environmental consciousness among consumers," says Suzanne Grayson, an industry consultant and publisher of The Grayson Report.

An exclusive Advertising Age/Gallup Organization survey found 60% of consumers say they oppose animal testing on cosmetics and toiletries such as shampoo, lipstick and perfume (see survey results on Page S-2).

Yet according to industry estimates, cosmetics and toiletries companies use only one-half of 1% of all laboratory animals and some 90% of those are rats and mice.

The position of the CTFA—and most health-and-beauty aids companies—is that animal testing is vital to ensure product safety.

Exclusive Advertising Age Gallup Organization survey of consumer attitudes on animal testing: Results on Page S-2.

"The last thing a company wants is a liability suit . . . for a product that wasn't tested," says David Williams, a consultant with the New England Consulting Group.

Still, the beauty-aids industry is "particularly vulnerable to consumer boycotts because it makes products that many consumers deem non-essential," says Henry Spira, coordinator of Animal Rights Coalition, New York.

The list of major cosmetics and toiletries marketers that have abandoned animal testing includes Revlon Inc., Avon Products and Unilever-U.S. subsidiaries Chesebrough-Pond's and Faberge Inc.

Mary Kay Cosmetics and Amway Corp. last year declared moratoriums on animal testing, and Procter & Gamble Co.'s Noxell Corp. subsidiary earlier this year decided to replace tests once performed on the eyes of live rabbits with laboratory tests.

None of the companies say pressure from animal-rights organizations has forced them to alter their positions. Instead, industry executives cite "increased confidence" in the reliability of alternative testing methods.

Not surprisingly, animal testing is a topic few companies want to discuss or advertise.

"It's not a matter of ignoring public awareness of animal testing," says NECG's Mr. Williams. "But it's not a viable marketing strategy for cosmetics, personal-care or household product companies that depend on new technologies and new products to

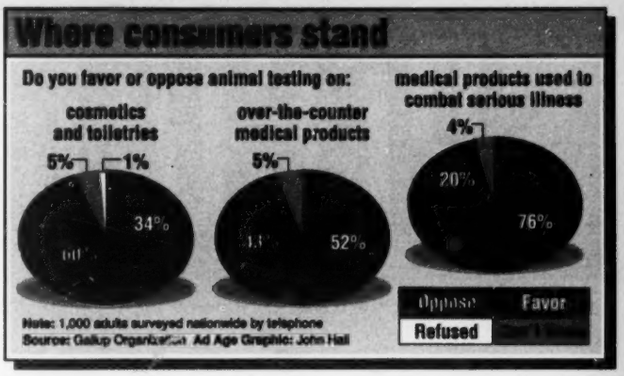
Consumers at odds with animal testing

Survey finds majority oppose it on beauty aids, but respondents lack information on merits



By Adrienne Ward

Consumers are giving a thumbs-down response to animal testing on cosmetics and toiletries.

In an exclusive Advertising Age study conducted by the Gallup Organization, 60% of the 1,000 adults surveyed claim they oppose animal testing on cosmetics and toiletries, and 89% say they would purchase products that are not tested on animals.

But while the majority oppose such testing procedures, nearly half of the respondents say they do not know if the products they use are tested on animals.

This dichotomy suggests marketers are not providing enough information in advertising and on packaging to influence consumers' buying decisions.

The results of the study could also reflect consumers' lack of understanding of the merits of animal testing.

The issue of animal testing on consumer products has grown steadily with the "green" movement.

As environmental concerns gain space in the media and importance among consumers, animal testing has become a marketing strategy with some cosmetics and toiletries companies.

But most marketers in this category do not discuss their testing procedures in advertising or packaging.

In the past year, Revlon Inc., Avon Products and Unilever-U.S. subsidiaries Chesebrough-Pond's and Faberge Inc. dropped animal testing while Mary Kay Cosmetics and Amway Corp. issued a moratorium on the practice. Most received extensive publicity in the media for their actions.

Even so, 88% of consumers surveyed by telephone say they are unaware of any cosmetics or toiletries marketers that have stopped animal testing in the past year. This suggests that while consumers may oppose animal testing, they are not dedicated to following the issue.

Only 5.2% could name a marketer that has stopped animal testing with Avon being cited most often, followed by Revlon and Mary Kay.

Women, the primary purchasers of cosmetics and toiletries such as shampoo, lipstick and perfume, are more opposed to animal testing on such products than men; 68% of women oppose it vs. 52% of men.

But 46% of women surveyed do not know if the products they presently use are tested on animals. Only 11% can identify a marketer that has stopped such testing procedures. Of the women who are aware of such bans, 28% cited Avon.

Consumers' reaction to animal testing is directed primarily at cosmetics and toiletries such as shampoo, lipstick and perfume: 76% of respondents say they favor animal tests on products used to combat serious illnesses such as cancer and AIDS, and 52% favor animal testing on medical products sold over the counter such as headache pills. □ remain competitive."

Revlon this year is promoting its first 100% non-animal-tested product, Pure Skin Care, with a campaign by Tarlow Advertising, New York, that will tout the absence of animal testing.

But the industrywide lack of promotion shows up clearly in the Gallup study for Advertising Age (see story and charts above).

The results show that although most consumers oppose animal testing on cosmetics and toiletries, most also are unaware of companies' involvement with such tests.

The survey results reflect consumers' lack of understanding of the "complex" animal-testing issue, industry lobbyists say. "There hasn't been enough education out there to educate consumers that animal testing ensures human health and safety," says Irene Malbin, CTFA VP-public affairs. The CTFA has compiled informational kits designed to educate legislators and the media on why it believes testing must remain an option, she adds.

On the other end of the controversy, Kathy Guillermo, director of PETA's campaign to stop product testing on animals, says she believes the survey results "indicate there's a growing awareness of what's being done to animals in the name of beauty."

The results match similar data amassed by P&G, a favorite boycott target of animal-rights activists. "We find consumers assume products are safe, but they don't understand the process products go through to be safe," says a P&G spokeswoman.

Observers on both side of the issue agree P&G plays a leading role in developing alternatives to animal testing.

While the U.S. Food & Drug Administration does not explicitly endorse animal testing, the agency "strongly urges cosmetic manufacturers to conduct whatever toxicological or other tests that are appropriate to substantiate the safety of the cosmetics," an FDA spokesman says.

The absence of advertising related to animal testing reflects the fact that "companies don't want to remind consumers that animals at any time have played a role in making cosmetics," Mr. Spira says. "And for people who don't consider animal testing an issue . . . companies feel there's no benefit in mentioning the subject."

Yet marketers that promote beauty aids as being free of animal testing may reap big profits in the 1990s, which so far has developed a reputation for being the decade of environmental awareness.

"Once people know [about animal testing], they would very happily buy products that are not tested on animals," asserts PETA's Ms. Guillermo.

In a poll conducted by the Council on Economic Priorities, 78% of respondents say they had "switched brands" because of the council's "Shopping for a Better World" ratings. The guide rates corporate performance in 10 categories, including the environment and animal testing.

Most companies marketing "cruelty-free" products are small, and their products are found mainly in natural food stores or their own boutiques.

The Body Shop International, with 14 outlets in the U.S., asserts prominently in its stores and catalogs that animal testing is "Cruel, unncessary and rejected by The Body Shop."

Instead, The Body Shop uses volunteers and in-vitro procedures to test ingredients and products. "We have found, over time, that human testing is reliable," says Michael Waldock, president of Body Shop U.S. "There's no rational reason . . . to use animal tests."

Genesis Inc., a 6-month-old company, recently introduced in the U.S. a non-animal-tested line the company hopes will win mainstream distribution.

Genesis imports BWC, an extensive line of color cosmetics, skin treatment and hair-care items from Beauty Without Cruelty, based in Tonbridge, England.

The company plans to spend $30,000 to advertise BWC this year, primarily in magazines such as Mother Jones and East-West Journal. Shadorf & Hennessy, San Francisco, is the agency.

"Publicity on both sides of the issue have made consumers think about where they are going to draw the line, whether they want to buy products that have been tested on animals," says Scott Egide, Genesis VP. □

Is 'cruelty-free' for real?

Toxicologist questions authenticity

Cosmetics marketers that pitch their products as being "cruelty-free" could be playing a game of smoke and mirrors.

"Products that have not been tested on animals are made from formulations or slight variations of ones that have already been tested," says Dr. Alan Goldberg, director of the Johns Hopkins University Center for Alternatives to Animal Testing. "No one would market a product that hasn't been tested by someone."

Dr. Goldberg has been developing animal-testing alternatives since 1981, when he initiated the center at the request of the Cosmetic, Toiletry & Fragrance Association.

The center is developing in-vitro methods that are widely used as alternatives to animal tests. The testing methods involve collecting cells in a glass dish and growing a piece of tissue after adding the proper nutrients. Toxicologists can then test products or chemicals on the tissue.

"I believe it's essential to use fewer animals. That's doing the right thing," Dr. Goldberg says. "Bio-medical scientists . . . aren't cruel; we realize [laboratory animals] are living, breathing beings."

Still, Dr. Goldberg worries an alternative testing method will backfire someday, resulting in a product that has negative side effects on consumers.

A. Goldberg

"If untried methods are too rampantly pushed and then fail, that would set us back years and years," he says.

"Today, you don't have cosmetics causing blindness; 35 years ago, you did.

"There's been a change in Western society where you can walk into a store and buy something and you know it's safe. A brand stands for something now."

There is also the matter of money.

Testing a new chemical or ingredient on animals can cost $500,000 to $1.5 million, take two or three years and require the sacrifice of thousands of animals. "We don't have the space, money or time for that," he says.

JANUARY AD RESULTS

January a bleak start to first-quarter slide

January was dismal for magazines tracked by Publishers Information Bureau, with total ad page counts down 4.8% from a year ago to 10,399.89.

The slide was anticipated. December's ad page tally fell 1.7% from the same month in 1988, and publishers expected marketers to tighten their belts in the first quarter this year in anticipation of a weakened economy.

Although February and March are expected to be slow, magazines project ad pages will bounce back in the second quarter.

Time Inc. Magazine Co.'s weeklies were among the long list of titles taking strong hits. People, Time and Sports Illustrated all posted year-to-year declines for the month, coinciding with Time's launch of Entertainment Weekly, its most aggressive start-up in years.

But perhaps most battered by January's fallout were women's magazines, including the "Seven Sisters." Family Circle saw ad pages dip 35.6% to 61.8, while McCall's suffered a 25.3% drop to 55.89 pages.

Good Housekeeping's pages fell 19.5% to 75.98; Redbook fell 26.7% to 55.77 pages; Better Homes & Gardens carried 64.57 pages, a 13.2% dip; and Woman's Day posted a 21.4% decline to 74.74 pages. Meredith Corp.'s Ladies' Home Journal, led by new publisher Donna Galotti, was least affected. The magazine carried 83.19 ad pages, down just 1.6%.

Among other women's titles, Cosmopolitan's pages dropped 9.1% to 117.29; Lear's saw pages fall 29.5% to 49.15; and New Woman suffered a 15.3% decline to 52.94 ad pages.

In contrast, Lang Communications' Working Woman had a strong month with 87.62 ad pages, a 23.2% jump. Lang's Working Mother carried 44.47 pages, up 2.4%.

Vogue led the fashion magazine category with 101.85 pages, a 3% gain.

Men's magazines also posted poor January results. Category leader GQ carried 68.04 ad pages, down 17.5%, while Esquire carried 62.85, a 15% decline. Playboy's pages fell 40.8% to 58.11. Penthouse was up 2.9% to 56.87.

Among general sports books, Time Warner's Sports Illustrated carried 147.03 ad pages, down 23.2%. The Sporting News' pages fell 20.7% to 40.96. Sport carried 20.61 ad pages, down 10.6%.

Time led the Big 3 newsweeklies, with January pages down 0.1% at 187.99. Newsweek carried 145.94 pages, down 7.5%. U.S. News & World Report's pages dipped 6.7% to 111.27.

People saw pages fall 16.7% to 174.28. TV Guide, coming off a year in which its ad pages fell 7.2%, continued its slide. It carried 253.03 pages last month, down 17.6%.

TV Guide still came in second among all magazines, behind Fortune as No. 1. Time Warner's Fortune carried 257.83 ad pages, a 6.6% drop. Forbes finished third with 247.15 ad pages, a 9.6% increase. Business Week, 1989's ad page leader, was fourth with 241.52 pages, down 2.1%.

Rounding out the top 10 were Entrepreneur (220.95 pages, up 9.8%); Yachting (191.68, down 4.1%); Time; Golf Magazine (184.32, up 12.1%); The Economist (175.04, up 23.9%); and People.

Among the month's few shining stars were The New Yorker, with 166.49 pages, a 10.2% increase, and National Geographic Magazine, which carried 20.64 pages, more than double January 1989's 9.82 pages.

Architectural Digest bounced back after a weak December, carrying 116.85 ad pages, a 7.4% increase.

The highly competitive travel field remained strong for category leaders, but some second-tier books weakened. American Express Publishing Corp.'s Travel & Leisure carried 86.62 ad pages, up 27.8%. Conde Nast Traveler was up 7.2% to 57.19 pages. National Geographic Traveler continued its steady growth with 21.72 ad pages, a 43.4% climb. But Endless Vacation saw pages fall 44.8% to 37.14, and Travel Holiday's pages dipped 10.7% to 19.32. □

Arbitron, Nielsen ready passports

Programming and business-side developments in broadcasting.

Passive invasion. Telemetric's passive people meters soon will be migrating to the U.S. from France by way of the Arbitron Co. The research company said the first shipment of Motivac meters is expected within the next two months. The meters could be in operation as early as 1991, pending evaluation and certification by Underwriters Laboratories and the Federal Communications Commission. Successive shipments will be integrated into its ScanAmerica service as well as local-market TV measurements, Arbitron said. The company will spend $150 million over six years to bring as many as 36,000 Motivacs here.

The boat sails both ways. A.C. Nielsen Co. was awarded the contract for pan-European TV audience measurement in 11 countries by Pan-European Television Audience Research. That group includes the BBC; RAI (Italian state TV); Sky Television; and two German-language satellite channels, RTL Plus and Sat 1. Included in the contract are cable households in West Germany, the Netherlands, Belgium, Switzerland, Austria, Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Finland, the U.K. and Ireland. Terms of the contract weren't disclosed.

Recycled news to go. Instead of allowing the nightly news to simply fade from memory, NBC News Productions is culling from its broadcasts and creating a new 1-hour monthly audio program recapping major news events. "NBC News Pulse," introduced by Tom Brokaw, includes reports on business, film, medicine, music, science, sports and special features. The network tested the tape last fall and is seeking corporate or special-interest group sponsors. NBC will distribute the cassette to the sponsor's targeted audience.

Betting on radio. Pete Rose may be banned from baseball but not from the airwaves. Cincinnati's WCKY-AM news/talk radio has added the record-setting hitter to its weekday on-air lineup. Starting March 19, Mr. Rose will give a 3-minute daily report, "On the Ball With Pete Rose," and will join local sportscaster John Popovich on Thursday evenings for "Pete Rose on Baseball," a 1-hour weekly conversation series. □

Martin Sorrell's (r.) demands may have killed a deal between JWT and Frank Lorenzo's (l.) Continental.

Sorrell vs. Lorenzo

Conflicts over payment and clients kept JWT from deal with Continental

By Jennifer Lawrence

The sky was gray and overcast when Burt Manning flew into Houston on Friday, March 2—a fitting omen, as it turned out, for what was to happen that day.

Mr. Manning, chairman of J. Walter Thompson Co., was in Houston to try to win the $40 million-to-$50 million Continental Airlines account.

Pulling it off would bring together two of the toughest, most tight-fisted bosses in the world: Frank Lorenzo and Martin Sorrell.

Mr. Lorenzo, chairman of Continental and its parent, Texas Air Corp., was said to like JWT, New York, which had nearly won the account in 1986 when N W Ayer, now the fired incumbent, took home the prize.

Mr. Sorrell, WPP Group's chief executive, has been called the "Frank Lorenzo of advertising" by The Wall Street Journal. He was said to be pressuring WPP's JWT to improve its profit margins. A big win would help.

Mr. Manning's agency, previously ruled out of the running for the account because of a conflict with its Los Angeles office's Mexicana Airlines business, had emerged as a secret, last-minute contender.

Other agencies close to the competition were now saying a JWT/Continental alliance was almost certain.

Mr. Manning nonetheless touched down at the airport in Houston with a sense of foreboding. WPP, wary of Continental's financial condition, was insisting on something that could sour the deal: JWT would take on the account only if Continental agreed to, in essence, pay cash upfront rather than in 30 days as was done with Ayer and as is customary in the industry.

This arrangement would have amounted to WPP extending no credit to Continental. One source said it wouldn't be surprising for Mr. Sorrell to insist Continental be responsible for all media buys.

In fact, Robert Lerwill, WPP's chief financial officer, was also in Houston that day, dispatched by WPP to meet with Continental executives, presumably to lay down the payment terms.

At the fancy, marble-swathed Ritz-Carlton Hotel, Mr. Manning and his team waited for the Continental negotiators later that day.

Could he pull this off? Could he handle the delicate diplomacy needed to bring his boss, Mr. Sorrell, and the mercurial and equally demanding Mr. Lorenzo together?

Though neither Mr. Sorrell nor Mr. Lorenzo would be at the meeting, the wishes and indomitable will of each unquestionably overshadowed the talks, guiding each side's negotiators.

The Continental team—believed to be headed by John Nelson, exec VP-marketing, and James O'Donnell, senior VP-marketing—arrived. As the talks progressed, it became clear WPP's insistence on upfront payment had indeed become a stumbling block.

By nightfall, it looked grim, but not yet over. The dispirited JWT negotiators and their Continental counterparts parted company. By last Tuesday it was over.

It's still unclear even now who ended the talks. Partly, it appears, the conflict involving Mexicana was a factor. But it also appears certain payment terms really doomed the deal.

JWT now will watch on the sidelines as Continental chooses another agency—either Lintas:New York,

WPP tops Saatchi in AA rankings

An Advertising Age roundup

WPP Group has become the world's largest agency group, surpassing Saatchi & Saatchi Co. in gross income and billings.

Figures submitted by both London-based companies showed WPP's 1989 gross income was $2.4 billion on billings of $16.05 billion. Saatchi reported $2.3 billion in gross income and $15.75 billion in billings.

The figures were submitted for Advertising Age's annual Agency Income Report, to be published March 26.

Ad Age's rankings are based on gross income. Last year, Saatchi was No. 1 and WPP ranked No. 3.

When examining figures for the two agency groups based solely on income from ad activities, however, Saatchi tops WPP. Saatchi claims 1989 gross income from advertising of $1.65 billion, while WPP only racked up $1.58 billion.

Advertising accounted for 71.7% of Saatchi's gross income and 71% of its billings. Advertising accounted for 65.9% of WPP's gross income and billings.

Saatchi's 1989 gross income grew 15.6% from 1988

Promotions root around for seedlings

By Laurie Freeman and Scott Hume

The promotional marketing premium of the 1990s is . . . tree seedlings.

Companies such as McDonald's Corp., Ralston Purina Co., Dayton Hudson Department Stores Co. and Quintessence plan to give out seedlings this spring in promotions tied to Earth Day, Arbor Day or other environmental awareness events.

Many other marketers have held back on using this promotion for a simple reason: The demand has been so great, there aren't any seedlings left.

"The demand has been enormous this year," said Rich Hankinson, seedling sales manager for Weyerhaeuser Co.

"We're at the bottom of the barrel already," the executive added.

He estimates Weyerhaeuser this year will provide

K/D/P office for sale

NEW YORK—Della Femina, McNamee WCRS is negotiating to buy Keye/-Donna/Pearlstein's office here, sources close to the talks said. The office opened more than a year ago and has about $10 million in billings. The office's vice chairmen-directors of creative services, Tod Seisser and Jay Taub, both worked at Della Femina earlier in their careers. Los Angeles-based K/D/P executives wouldn't comment on the negotiations but denied speculation the rest of the agency is for sale because of the loss of the Suzuki auto account. Della Femina Chairman Jerry Della Femina declined comment at press time but previously said his agency was interested in acquiring another New York shop.

Dentsu, U.S. shops talk

CHICAGO—Dentsu executives from Tokyo and New York met last week with Bernard Miller Jr., chairman of Columbian Advertising here, a promotion agency specializing in point of purchase. Mr. Miller said Dentsu "was interested in getting an introduction to our agency, meet with our executives and review the work we've done. We may work together on some projects, wherever that might lead." Sources also said that Dentsu is getting closer to a marketing partnership with FKB Group, London, which has U.S. headquarters in Stamford, Conn. (AA, Dec.

New Mac ups power

But Apple still needs low-end PC

By Bradley Johnson

Apple Computer will break separate ad campaigns around the world March 19 to launch its most powerful and costly Macintosh ever.

Different ad campaigns will break simultaneously around the world.

The first three pages of the U.S. ad will be devoted to the power and ease of use of the new Macintosh IIfx. The fourth page shows how the new entry fits into Apple's broad Macintosh lineup.

"The power to be your best" continues as the theme line.

To fight the perception that Macintosh is only a graphics machine, ads will play up its abilities as a general, heavy-duty business computer.

BBDO Worldwide, Los Angeles, handles the U.S. account. BBDO offices also serve most of Apple's foreign markets.

The new Macintosh, priced at about $10,000, will target large corporate and government accounts for such uses as engineering and database management.

The Macintosh IIfx will compete with top-of-the-line personal computers from IBM Corp. and with the low end of the burgeoning electronic workstation category, which includes entries from Sun Microsystems and Next Inc.

This is the first major product and ad move from Apple since it underwent a highly publicized management and personnel shake-up earlier this year to counter slowing growth.

The new machine bears the imprint of two now-departed executives: Allan Loren, former president of Apple's U.S. division and a big advocate of getting Apples into big business, and Jean-Louis Gassee, former president of Apple Products, who believed in pushing the power of Macintosh onward and upward.

But it does nothing to solve Apple's biggest problem—the lack of new machines to replace the aging, below-$2,000 Macintosh Plus and Apple II computers intended for the massive home, small-business and educational categories.

International Data Corp., a market research company, estimated the overall PC and workstation market at $28 billion this year. About half the PCs sold in the U.S. will be priced at under $2,500.

A low-end Macintosh rumored for introduction before Christmas could prove a pivotal product.

"The key issue for Apple over the next 12 months is going to be filling that gap," said David Carnevale, VP and analyst at InfoCorp., a consultancy. □

Departures hit Riney

By Alice Z. Cuneo

SAN FRANCISCO—The exodus from Hal Riney & Partners escalated last week as four VPs bolted to form their own agency.

The latest departures follow the exit of three top Riney creatives from the office here and resignations from other offices.

Since last August, at least 10 executives have left Riney.

Leaving last week were Tom Bedecarre, 34, VP-management supervisor on the Perrier Group and the Stroh Brewery Co. accounts; Kirk Citron, 33, senior VP and senior writer; Jeff Atlas, 33, VP copywriter; and Matt Haligman, 31, VP-art director.

Their agency here will be called Atlas Citron Haligman & Bedecarre.

Mr. Riney, who formed his own agency in 1986 from the former Ogilvy & Mather San Francisco office, has seen people under his direction form three shops. The other two are Goodby, Berlin & Silverstein (1983) and Mandelbaum Mooney Ashley (1988).

Mr. Bedecarre said he and his partners "have thought about starting our own group for years and had it in the works." The timing—in the wake of other departures, rumors about the agency's sale and the Perrier recall—is "purely coincidental," he said.

J. Atlas

K. Citron

Mr. Riney expressed no concern over the departures.

"It happens all the time," said the agency's chairman-ceo, adding that "there's something flattering" about being considered "the father of creative directors."

One Riney official who asked to remain anonymous called the departures "a gift of some additional housecleaning. In a dynamic business like this, you have to freshen the pool."

The other departures include:

- Peter Murphy, San Francisco creative director, who joined Backer Spielvogel Bates, New York, as exec VP-copywriter.
- Dan Mountain, senior VP-associate creative director, who left last month to become senior VP-co-creative director at Hill, Holliday, Connors, Cosmopulos, Marina del Rey, Calif.
- Mike Leonard, senior VP-creative director, who went to Foote, Cone & Belding as senior VP-group creative director.

Also, Riney's Chicago office lost two top creatives, Ron Hawkins and Bob Taylor, to DDB Needham Worldwide in Chicago (AA, Jan. 8).

Last August, Bob Cox, senior VP-executive creative director of the New York office, resigned.

Though Mr. Riney is known to be difficult to work with at times, none of the departees said they were unhappy with their old jobs.

"It was an opportunity I couldn't refuse," said Mr. Leonard, who created award-winning work at Riney for the United Way of the Bay Area. "Hal has taught me a great deal, and I've gotten a lot from him."

Mr. Mountain said he took his new job because "it was an offer that was awfully good—it would have been silly to turn it down."

Mr. Murphy said he had wanted to return to New York. □

TV nets risk glut of sports

By Wayne Walley

The Big 3 networks, along with ESPN and Turner Broadcasting System, could be forced into creating a two-tier price structure to sell the massive amount of sports inventory resulting from the latest round of TV contracts.

ABC, CBS, NBC, ESPN and Turner have spent more than double the previous TV contract renewals, shelling out about $8 billion over the past 18 months to secure rights to Major League Baseball, the National Basketball Association, the National Collegiate Athletic Association basketball tournament, the 1992 and 1994 Winter Olympics, the 1992 Summer Olympics and the National Football League.

Last week, CBS wrapped up the latest football deal, spending an estimated $1 billion for a package of Sunday afternoon National Football Conference games, playoffs and the 1992 Super Bowl, a 76% increase.

NBC also completed its four-year, $753 million deal for Sunday afternoon American Football Conference games, playoffs and the 1993 Super Bowl, a 57% increase.

Earlier this month, ABC spent $950 million in a four-year deal for rights to "Monday Night Football," two wild-card playoff games each year and the 1991 Super Bowl, a 61% increase.

The spending spree adds up to what advertisers and agency executives believe will be a glut of inventory, softening the marketplace and bringing opportunistic buys back to sports.

"CBS made a presentation for time available in the NCAA tournament and the Final Four a week before the games started. That's unprecedented," said Steve Auerbach, senior VP-director of network programming at Ally & Gargano, New York.

"People are going to start waiting for the pendulum to swing back

Publishers bracing for smoke-free pages

By Scott Donaton

Magazine publishers are girding themselves for life after tobacco.

Amid a growing number of legislative threats to tobacco advertising, publishers are fighting harder than ever to keep the category in their pages. But they're also starting to form contingency plans for their publications minus tobacco ads.

Time Warner's Entertainment Weekly, which made its debut last month, went so far as to exclude tobacco advertising from its business plan, though it does accept it. Tobacco is expected to account for at least 10% of the title's launch-year revenues.

"If you're going to start publishing a new magazine in 1990, you would be irresponsible not to look at the case where tobacco advertising wouldn't be around in five years," said Michael Klingensmith, Entertainment Weekly publisher. "If the magazine wasn't viable without tobacco, you wouldn't want to start it."

Publishers of more established titles insist they don't have a grand plan for dealing with the disappearance of tobacco ads. But industry experts say that behind the scenes, magazines are scrambling to bring in new categories and pressing marketers in existing categories to boost spending.

"Even though publishers haven't given up the fight, the expectation is that within five years, tobacco will be gone," said PaineWebber analyst J. Kendrick Noble. "A lot of magazines just aren't budgeting for tobacco when doing long-term planning."

Other new magazines such as Forbes Inc.'s Egg—an ideal vehicle for tobacco marketers—are trying to avoid an addiction to tobacco pages from the start.

"We don't see tobacco as a prime category," said Egg President Timothy Forbes. "I'm happy to have it, but I don't see it as a cornerstone the way I see liquor, fashion, entertainment and beauty. We won't live or die by it."

Proposed bans on tobacco advertising have surfaced in the past, but 1990 may be the year the issue is put to its toughest test. A growing number of bills that would restrict or ban the promotion and advertising of tobacco products are pending in Congress (see related stories on Page 6).

Among the most feared is a bill from Sen. Edward Kennedy (D., Mass.) that would repeal the federal pre-emption of state restrictions on tobacco advertising. If the bill passes, it could result in a de facto ban on national tobacco ads.

In addition, Health & Human Services Secretary Louis

Y&R grooms Pollak, Burandt for future

By Jon Lafayette

NEW YORK—The future leaders of Young & Rubicam emerged last week from the agency's reorganization.

Tim Pollak and Gary Burandt are seen as leading candidates to be the next-generation management team at privately held Y&R.

Mr. Pollak has been mentioned as a possible successor to Alexander Kroll when the 51-year-old chairman-ceo of Young & Rubicam decides to step aside.

That isn't likely to happen soon. "We're all pretty young, it's probably premature to talk about my successor," Mr. Kroll said.

But Mr. Kroll, who succeeded Ed Ney as chairman in 1986, had been tapped as a candidate for the agency's top spot several years before the move.

Mr. Pollak, the 43-year-old ceo of HDM Worldwide, Y&R's joint venture with two other international agencies, last week was named president-ceo of Y&R's flagship New York office.

Gary Burandt, 46, now ceo of Y&R Sovero in Moscow, was named to replace Mr. Pollak at HDM.

The moves place executives being groomed for leadership roles into key positions, Mr. Kroll acknowledged.

"It's perfectly appropriate at this time," he said. "We've given some younger people a chance to really flex their muscles and given them new challenges."

Dentsu, Tokyo, and Eurocom, Paris, Y&R's partners in HDM, "were very pleased for Tim getting a chance to run our flagship company," Mr. Kroll said. During Mr. Pollak's tenure, HDM grew 30% annually.

The HDM partners "were also delighted about Gary," Mr. Kroll said. "He has all the credentials."

With the reorganization last week, Mr. Kroll appears to be fine-tuning the classic Y&R "whole egg" approach of providing a supermarket of services for each client.

In the new arrangement, Y&R companies including Cato Johnson/Y&R and Landor Associates are no longer part of Y&R Advertising, enabling each to develop its own management and strength

Pepsi yawning over relaunch plans for Coke II

By Patricia Winters

Pepsi-Cola Co. is taking the high road and likely will ignore Coca-Cola Co.'s announced relaunch of new Coke as Coke II.

A Pepsi-Cola spokesman called Coke II—designed to take young consumers from Pepsi—another "validation of the great taste of Pepsi."

That reaction provides a hint of Pepsi's possible marketing strategy should its competitor roll national with Coke II.

"Pepsi should treat this the same way they treated new Coke," said Al Ries, partner at Trout & Ries marketing consultants. "They should pooh-pooh it; it's another attempt to launch a me-too product."

But Coke II, which will go into an undisclosed test market within the next few months, could create a strategic problem for Pepsi-Cola.

Already, Coca-Cola is using Diet Coke to attack Pepsi, claiming consumers are switching from sugared Pepsi to sugar-free Diet Coke. That positioning, targeting Pepsi's 25-to-49-year-old base, has been lauded as a way to attack Pepsi without dragging flagship Coca-Cola Classic into the fray.

But Pepsi's core strength is with "the new generation"—preteens and young adults, and it's that group Coca-Cola wants to attract with Coke II.

In 1989, Coca-Cola Classic had a 20% share of the estimated $43 billion soft-drink market, followed by Pepsi with 18.3%, according to Beverage Digest, an industry newsletter. New Coke was far behind with a 1.4% share.

In supermarket sales—where consumers have a choice of brands—the two leaders are even closer. In December, for instance, Pepsi and Coca-Cola Classic were tied with 15.8% of the market. Classic and new Coke combined had 16.6%.

Coca-Cola's attempts to attract Pepsi's young consumers with new Coke failed, at least partly because of the brand's ambiguity and the stigma it still carries from its birth as a reformulated Coca-Cola in 1985.

The brand never established its

Tie-ins will give boost to Mutants' movie

By Marcy Magiera

They're lean, green and soon they'll be on movie screens, K mart shelves and Burger King displays.

"Teenage Mutant Ninja Turtles," the live-action movie, opens nationally March 30, backed by an estimated $8 million promotional campaign by the film's distributor, New Line Cinema.

MOVIE MARKETING

But that's just the start. Advertising and promotion dollars spent by other marketers, directly or indirectly tied in to the movie, could push spending for "Ninja Turtles" into the $30 million range.

New Line and marketers including K mart Corp., Ralston Purina Co., ConAgra Consumer Frozen Food Co., Kraft General Foods Group and Burger King Corp. are hoping to tap the interest of kids who are already watching Group W Productions' syndicated "Teenage Mutant Ninja Turtles" cartoon and buying a slew of merchandise from some 300 Ninja Turtles licensees.

"We get a lot of inquiries about possible tie-ins such as this, [but] we found this one intriguing," said K mart VP-Marketing Michael Wellman.

"In so many of the others, the product is brand-new and quite often products tied to movies aren't very successful. This product already has a track record," he said. "The movie is following the success of the [licensed merchandise] and the cartoon."

K mart on April 1 will launch an in-store promotional campaign and sweepstakes tied to the movie. The retailer also will devote part of its 72 million circulation newspaper insert to the "Ninja Turtles" promotion on April 1. Ross Roy Inc., Bloomfield Hills, Mich., is K mart's agency.

Automakers, Sears fuel gain in TV spending

By Wayne Walley

NEW YORK—Sears, Roebuck & Co.'s big TV ad budget promoting its "everyday low price" strategy and the automotive industry's fourth-quarter spending spree helped broadcast TV reap a record $21.3 billion in 1989 ad revenues.

The total represented a 3.6% gain despite a drop of more than $100 million in political ads from 1988, said the Television Bureau of Advertising, which compiled the figures from Broadcast Advertisers Reports.

The automotive industry topped all ad categories for the first time. Automakers spent a combined $2.97 billion on network, spot and national syndication in 1989, a 14% increase, and also helped fuel the record network upfront selling season last summer.

The auto industry's total of $2,969,741,100 edged ahead of 1988's top-spending category, food and food products, by close to $600,000.

National syndication showed the largest percentage increase among the TV media, jumping 42.9% to $1.3 billion. Network TV revenues, without national elections or the Winter and Summer Olympics, remained flat at about $9.6 billion.

Top-rated NBC led the Big 3 networks with revenues of $3.7 billion in 1989, down about 3.7%. ABC's revenues initially dipped by more than 25% without the influx of Winter Olympic sales revenue in the first quarter, but the network finished the year with $3 billion in ad revenues, almost equal to 1988.

CBS was the only Big 3 network to show improvement in 1989 with revenues increasing about 4% to $2.85 billion.

General Motors Corp. led all advertisers in network TV spending with $506.5 million, up 14%. Sears' spending shot up 118% to $187 million to rank ninth among network advertisers. Sears also upped its local/retail TV ad budget by 210%, spending $46.5 million to rank seventh among local/-retail advertisers.

In syndication, Philip Morris Cos. remained the top advertiser, spending $106 million, up 21%. Procter & Gamble Co. spent almost $88 million in syndication, a 39% increase, while Kellogg Co. more than doubled its syndication spending to $50.6 million from $23.4 million.

National and regional spot TV ad revenues totaled $5.4 billion, up 2.3%, TvB reported. Local TV spending increased 4.5% to nearly $5.1 billion.

The automotive companies, including dealer associations and all products and services, particularly helped push up the spot business.

GM ($350 million), Ford Motor Co. ($180 million), Chrysler Corp. ($166 million), Toyota Motor Sales USA ($164 million), Nissan Motor Corp. USA ($121 million) and American Honda Motor Co. ($86 million) all ranked among the top 10 national and regional spot buyers. Their spending increases ranged from 8% to 41%. □

Paint makers stir up ads

By Kate Fitzgerald

Rival paint marketers are about to splatter one another in a spring battle for America's walls.

Glidden Co. fires first with a $10 million network TV campaign breaking today.

Sherwin-Williams Co.'s Dutch Boy brand will counterattack in May with a major network TV campaign, upping its ad budget to $15 million from $4 million last year.

Both want a bigger share of the $2.5 billion consumer paint industry. Competition has intensified as use of house paint has fallen, while other types of surfaces gain popularity, marketers say.

Yearend figures showed Glidden edging ahead of Sears, Roebuck & Co. with a 13.5% market share. Sears' Weatherbeater, Easy Living and other brands had 11.8% and Dutch Boy had 6.9%. Overall, Sherwin-Williams brands have about 20% of the market.

Both Glidden and Dutch Boy are previewing their ads at the Home Center Show in Chicago this week, vying to increase distribution of their products through the fast-growing do-it-yourself retail channel.

"The paint market is suffering from the loss of paintable surfaces," said Charlie Carpenter, Glidden VP-marketing services. "More new homes are being built with various wall coverings, along with more wood paneling, acoustical surfaces, solar panels and windows. There are fewer walls around to paint."

Glidden's four 15-second TV spots—its first new creative in two years—claim more people have switched to Glidden in the past five years than to any other brand.

Against original versions of "Stormy Weather" and "Whole Lotta Shakin' Goin' On," Glidden's new spots stress durability. Print starting May 1 supports. Meldrum & Fewsmith, Cleveland, handles.

"Dutch Boy and other paint marketers are going after yuppies, but yuppies don't buy paint," Mr. Carpenter said. "The biggest market is people between 35 and 55 who are rehabbing homes they already own."

Dutch Boy's TV campaign takes a "more positive" approach to marketing paint, said Pete Balint, director of advertising and marketing.

"The other paint marketers have turned people off to painting their homes through negative ads that talk about paint peeling, cracking and wearing out," he said. "Our approach is to make people really look forward to painting their homes—to want to paint."

The five new 15- and 30-second spots show a group of young people joyously painting a huge old home, with before-and-after glimpses. The spots are themed "The look that gets the looks."

Support in consumer magazines is planned. Griswold Inc. handles.

Dutch Boy also expects to see its market share grow through increased distribution.

Sears agreed to distribute Dutch Boy in its stores nationwide, starting March 1, as part of its move to offer more national brand names. □

House of the '90s opens up

Kitchen major ingredient in new product, marketing plans

By Lori Kesler

The house of the '90s may look like its Ozzie and Harriet ancestors from the exterior, but the interior will feature an openness and dedication to form and function that George Jetson might find comforting.

Interior structure will undergo drastic changes as rooms are redefined and merged in patterns that owe more to pragmatism than tradition, as shown on this page in the 5,000-square-foot "House of the 1990s" designed by Berkus Group Architects.

Home furnishings and appliances marketers will adapt to this spacial redefinition with products that allow for more flexible use. Formal furniture and sterile kitchen appliances will take on a more relaxed style, so they will be at home as much in a living room as in a kitchen.

The hub of family life will be a warmer, friendlier kitchen with an adjoining family living area, says Pamela Sutcliffe, publicist, Berkus Group.

Other experts agree, hinting at sweeping changes in home design and home product marketing.

Dorothy Kalins, editor in chief of Metropolitan Home, says the kitchen will be the family's prime gathering spot because it's a magnet for family members in the early evening.

FIRST LEVEL

"Working families these days are very busy," says Tom Jackson, building and environmental editor of Better Homes & Gardens. "When they collide in the house at 5 p.m. or 6 p.m., they want to make the most of the time they have together."

With people spending more time in the kitchen, appliance and furnishing design will change to make the room "more homey and less like an insecticide factory," says Ms. Kalins.

"In the 1970s and '80s, we wanted the cool European-style kitchens," says Joseph Ruggiero, editor in chief of Home. "Now we're going back to Grandma's house, with a fireplace in the kitchen, maybe a wood-burning pizza oven, a home-canning center and a vegetable garden outside the back door."

The Berkus Group house includes a kitchen with a self-contained living and dining area. This reflects a trend in home design "to bring the family together rather than scatter them in all directions," says Mr. Jackson. He adds that kitchen and family areas will be separated only by half-walls and pass-throughs.

"The kitchen will spill out into the family room, and the living and dining rooms will flow into

PEOPLE TO WATCH

Combine a new concept in shelter publishing with the Elle name and what results? Readers and advertisers.

The premiere March issue of Elle Decor, a Diamandis Communications publication based on the concept that readers want a magazine that presents a less regimented, more personal approach to interior design, carried 60 pages from such upscale marketers as Chanel and Mercedes-Benz. The initial rate base is 200,000; more than 30,000 already have subscribed.

The real challenge in launching any magazine is for the finished product to somewhat resemble the vision that inspired it.

That's where Louis Oliver Gropp comes in.

Mr. Gropp returned to publishing in January when he left his post as VP-design and creative services at fabric manufacturer WestPoint Pepperell to become Elle Decor's editor in chief.

The 54-year-old journalist is no stranger to the shelter magazine field. In fact, he's a grizzled 30-year veteran best known for his early-to-mid 1980s stint as editor in chief of Conde Nast Publication's House & Garden.

Contacted by Diamandis execs late last year, Mr. Gropp accepted the Elle Decor post without hesitation.

"Their vision of the magazine was one that I could easily embrace," he says. "It was a very good fit for me."

The typical member of the Elle Decor audience, says Mr. Gropp, is "an Elle reader who was never a shelter book reader, who will find in this book the kind of coverage she was accustomed to as a young Elle reader.

"The thing that sets Elle Decor apart from its fellow travelers in the shelter field is that it's going to be an interesting combination of wonderful rooms and homes and gardens and the connection to those things that make them magical. If we do a piece on gardens, we might do a separate story on colorful flower pots."

Country as chic as it ever was

But while the niche turns into a groundswell, other categories are emerging, with traditional and personal leading the way for publishers

By Scott Donaton

HOME READING

In magazine publishing, 12 years is a long time for one niche to stay hot, but country magazines have somehow managed to do just that.

Since the debut of Hearst Corp.'s Country Life in 1978, at least 30 titles have crowded the niche, which is still growing. Hearst will test the upscale Countryside this fall.

Despite country's lasting success, magazine publishers and editors are looking ahead, wondering what niche will next set the home magazine category on fire.

Two subcategories mentioned most often as likely contenders are traditional, actually an extension of the country category, and personal, which is named as both a new niche and a style that can be translated to existing home magazines.

"I believe the move is on towards traditional," says Jerry Ward, publisher of Meredith Corp.'s Better Homes & Gardens Special Interest Publications group. Mr. Ward, who also serves as publisher of Meredith's Traditional Home, admits he is biased, but says, "Traditional just seems to be the most important movement right now and it parallels the whole resurgence of traditional values and ideas."

Several publishers echo Mr. Ward's theory.

"There seems to be great interest in things traditional," says Thomas Losee Jr., publisher of Knapp Communication's Architectural Digest. "The stage is set from a sociological standpoint. People are hungering for more traditional values."

The traditional category includes Traditional Home, country books and any home magazine devoted to a basic lifestyle. Industry observers say people were interested in reading about such a lifestyle in the 1980s but are now ready to live it.

The second category they predict will heat up is less clearly defined: It is dubbed, for lack of a better word, "personal."

For example, Diamandis Communications' Elle Decor, which debuts in March, maintains that an individual's personal taste will play a larger role in interior design decisions in the coming decade.

"There will be a growth of individual styles of decorating," says Stephen Burzon, publisher of Meredith's Metropolitan Home. "I see an eclectic or personal style, a fashionable way of decorating that mixes country and contemporary, traditional and classic."

"Each [home] magazine in the market has a very specific style. It might be country or contemporary," says Elle Decor Publisher Polly Perkins. "What is unusual about Elle Decor is you can put it vices at researcher LINK Resources. "By the end of the '90s, we'll see 40-inch flat-screen sets for about $4,000."

Mr. Rosen estimates only high-end consumers, representing about 3% of the TV-buying market, will be active targets for these high-priced sets. "Prices will have to be $500 to $700 for the rest of society to jump in," he says.

Some industry sources suggest the price drop will occur much earlier if the right production technology is found.

The most imminent technological improvement for TV is Improved Definition Television, which uses digital technology to produce better pictures and allow picture-in-picture features.

IDTV sets priced for less than $2,000 will be out within the next two years, says David Bolotsky, consumer electronics market analyst for Goldman, Sachs & Co. "But I don't see the product taking off until the price point becomes less than $1,000."

Enhanced Definition TV, which requires FCC approval, also may be out before HDTV.

The market potential for both IDTV and EDTV depends "to a great extent on pricing," says Mr. Bolotsky. "There's no reason, if the pricing is right, why sometime down the road [sales of IDTV and EDTV sets] couldn't be half the market or more."

Laser discs, once considered dead, have returned because their resolution is considered superior to tape's and combination units that also play audio CDs have become available.

"Laser discs didn't have an auspicious beginning, but sometimes timing changes things," says Mr. Hametz.

Sony Corp. is expected to push personal video products that combine TVs with VCRs, but it's difficult to predict whether they will catch consumers' fancies as did the original Walkman.

Golden goose of '90s: Home office items

By Jacquelyn Bivins

OFFICE IN THE HOME

The long-predicted advent of the "electronic cottage" may finally be at hand. The concept of home businesses may not be new, but the anticipated explosion in the number of people working out of their homes in the future is.

The Berkus Group prototype design of the home of the '90s shown on Page S-1 allows for such an eventuality: It includes his-and-hers offices and space for a receptionist.

Manufacturers are preparing for an increased demand for high-tech home office equipment, confronting primarily a logistical problem of better targeting ad messages to home workers.

The numbers are compelling. By 1993, close to 38.5 million people may be working at home, according to LINK Resources' National Work-at-Home survey, up 55.2% from 1988. Home-based workers will make up 30.6% of the total U.S. labor force by 1993, according to the survey.

Growth in home office product sales are outdistancing the overall consumer electronics market, according to the Electronic Industries Association. In 1989, home office products (including cellular phones) represented $6.9 billion of the $32.2 billion industry. Home office product sales jumped 15% from 1988 to 1989 while total industry sales grew 6%.

The home office is not just a spin-off of big-city business, says Tom Lauterbach, VP-communications for EIA. "It is no longer a Chicago, New York or L.A. phenomenon," he says, but is affecting "more 'C' and 'D' counties."

It also is spreading beyond home workers simply adding an extra phone line and a word processor. "Whether it is because you are a salesman, a two-income family doing some work at home or an entrepreneur, five years from now most people with a home office will have a [personal computer], use a fax and do desktop publishing," says William Kopp, Panasonic Co.'s VP-communication products. "You won't be able to survive with a four-function calculator."

Panasonic is expanding its line of home office products, says Mr. Kopp. New facsimile and answering machines announced in January offer additional features tailored to home office needs.

Few suppliers currently are targeting advertising to home workers because of a lack of targeted media, says Jack Nilles, president of JALA Associates, a research company studying the market. Most home-based workers, heavily dependent on computers, "read one or more of the computer publications, but when it comes to advertising, there is very little there for them," he says.

Mr. Nilles says he expects home office product advertising to develop within a few years. "We're already seeing some shift in how companies are looking at advertising to this market. Magazines such as Home Office Computing and the support they are receiving by some companies, particularly Japanese marketers, shows how they are now starting to better target this market," he says.

"I expect to see other [print] vehicles being developed to reach this market. These vehicles will be more effective than current direct-mail efforts," Mr. Nilles says. □ in a room with three people [each with different design tastes] and each will tell you it's a magazine for them."

The home magazine category continues to expand; titles include: Countryside, Country Living, Elle Decor and Metropolitan Home.

Elle Decor seems to have hit a nerve. A test issue of the monthly published last fall carried 64 ad pages. And the magazine has pulled in more than 30,000 subscriptions prior to its launch.

While magazine executives admit the personal field may not become as crowded as country, it is likely existing titles will add the personal philosophy to their editorial formulas, adopting to some degree Elle Decor's "imagination, not imitation" slogan.

Existing titles such as Metropolitan Home already are positioning themselves as competitors to Elle Decor. And Architectural Digest is talking about the move to more personal style.

"It's now OK to mix different things in the house," Mr. Losee says. "In the past people were structured, but now there's so much more freedom of expression and a willingness to experiment."

Mr. Losee will not say whether AD will address the personal niche editorially, but acknowledges, "We try to react as best we can to trends."

But industry observers say the personal category is limited and question how many magazines it can support.

For one thing, the personal-style segment is not likely to attract new advertisers to home magazines, say insiders, leading to greater fragmentation of the advertising universe.

However, the personal segment is attracting a new type of product to shelter publications, says Ms. Perkins.

While the traditional and personal subcategories grow, industry observers predict the country category will stay hot in the '90s and continue to expand.

"Everything that's beginning sociologically is adding to the country fires," says John Mack Carter, editor in chief of Good Housekeeping and director of magazine development for Hearst. "People . . . feel they've lost something in the past, and they've found they can restore that through the country style."

Mr. Carter and others say the new generation of home magazines will likely approach country design from a less whimsical, more European-influenced angle, attracting a different class of shelter book advertiser.

Countryside, for example, is actually modeled after the British Country Living. He expects Countryside will attract advertisers of more sophisticated, high-end products. □ combines an 8mm VCR and small TV, is selling "for about 20 times the price of the audio Walkman—about $1,999," says Mr. Bolotsky. "But if marketed properly, portable video or TV could be very big."

"If marketed properly, portable video or TV could be very big."

He says the products' biggest obstacles are price, portable video's traditionally poor picture quality and lack of films available in 8mm format.

With marketers seeing lower growth in most segments, they will look to niches, such as the one Sony has targeted with My First Sony children's line.

"You will see more lifestyle-oriented product," says Mr. Mehrotra.

After seeing TV sales grow from 11 million to 22 million in the past decade, marketers will have to look for growth from new marketing techniques, he says.

"Instead of thinking of televisions as boxes, we will have to come up with added-value marketing ideas." While he would not disclose specific plans, Thomson's recent participation in tie-in promotions with McDonald's Corp. indicates what may be a big trend in consumer electronics in the near future. □

An unwanted comrade jumps on 'Soviet chic' bandwagon

(Rating: ★ ½)

By Bob Garfield

Garfield

"Soviet" brand jeans from Seattle, huh? Now there's an econopolitical mixed metaphor for you.

Jumping on the Big Thaw like a cheap suit, Seattle Pacific Industries is taking the ultimate symbol of Western bourgeois culture, the blue jean, and marketing it in the U.S. with a brand name signifying the very building blocks of the Red Utopia.

Karl Marx is probably turning in his grave, and so is Levi Strauss, I'll wager. We're talking after all about the quintessential American garment, the Western consumer product which—as a black-market staple most epitomizing the U.S.S.R.'s subterranean economy—contributed as much as the Strategic Defense Initiative to the current collapse of Soviet communism.

Scenes of confrontation, and the out-of-context use of the Russian language, make for a striking and extremely obnoxious introduction to Soviet sportswear.

Ochen stranniy, tovarishch.

Yes, comrade, very strange indeed. Apart from the fact that the marketing of "Soviet" sportswear is basically a Western enterprise, and beyond the irony of exploiting communist iconography for its profit potential, there is a central illogic to the whole thing—like an M.C. Escher print that seems at first glance to defy the physical limitations of 3-D space.

And that's before you even get to the advertising, which pits Japanese against American and black against white in order to deliver the glasnost-referencing Pollyannaism: "Work it out."

One of three 30-second spots from McCann-Erickson Worldwide, Seattle, depicts a fenced-in manufacturing plant of some kind. It's apparently a Japanese-owned plant in the U.S., and the American workers for some reason are locked outside the gate. After some shouting—in Russian, and don't ask me why—the Japanese steward opens the gate to let the Americans in.

In another spot, set on a New York street corner, a pair of Italian youths walk into a pair of black youths. Menacing glares are exchanged before they mutter something to one another—again in Russian—and pass without incident.

The third spot involves a confrontation between a black city gang and a rival gang member. I don't know what happens; the action is too confusing, but they do WORK IT OUT.

Penetrating social commentary from America's fashion industry.

"The spread of drugs, gang warfare, racism, etc. are a legacy of the 1980s that we hoped would go away but didn't," press-released Creative Director Jim Walker of McCann. "The phrase 'Soviet' reflects the attitude of the '90s, an international attitude, an attitude of hope. 'Work it out' sums up not only the attitude, but the work clothes' design principle behind the label."

Gag me with a spoonski.

Quick, notify the Ministry of Ideology and alert the People's Deputy Commissar for the Defense Against Counterrevolutionary Trivialization. Tell him an American company has hired Soviet fashion designers to help make mockery of the East-West peace process, the stakes of which are nothing less than the future of civilization.

Or call David Letterman and have him stoke up the Top 10 machine. Do something, because the last thing we need in the volatile midst of geopolitical turmoil is some pretentious blue-jean company spewing puerile moralisms at us.

It's all well and good that American marketers are moved to acknowledge major geopolitical changes and the prospects for deliverance from the nuclear guillotine. Maybe Quintessence and AT&T Co. seemed excessively ardent, or out of place or even crass in posing by the Berlin Wall, but you sensed that their heart was probably in the right place.

Not so here. While you can't blame Seattle Pacific for trying to make a big American buck off of Soviet chic, you can absolutely blame them for dishing out this insufferable pseudo-commentary—philosophical pablum that contaminates and overwhelms what otherwise would be unusually stunning work.

Chris Blum's cinematography is splendid. Norman Durkee's cello/piano/electric guitar/percussion music is riveting. And the notion of Russian words tumbling from proletarian American mouths would have been wonderful—in another context. Inscrutability in fashion advertising works. Sermonizing does not.

But, heck, as long as we're preaching to one another here, and in the spirit of global understanding, here's some advice to Seattle Pacific:

Throw it out. □

Magazine tobacco ads

Sullivan recently asked publishers to start carrying public service messages warning about the dangers of smoking.

"You'd have to have your head in the sand not to realize that with people like Kennedy and Sullivan, there's going to be a lot of excitement in Washington," said James Guthrie, exec VP-marketing development for the Magazine Publishers of America.

"When the opposition is this strong, smart businessmen have to consider their options," he said.

A recent study sponsored by the Leadership Council on Advertising Issues--a coalition of advertising, agency and media executives—detailed the possible consequences of a ban on tobacco advertising.

According to the report, as many as 165 magazines would fold without tobacco advertising. Magazines most likely to be seriously wounded include large-circulation general-interest titles, such as Time, Sports Illustrated, People, Newsweek and TV Guide, the report indicates (see chart on Page 3).

Resistance to anti-tobacco legislation is by no means waning, however. The MPA said it recently asked its members to lobby Congress, and representatives of the Freedom to Advertise Coalition testified at hearings last month in opposition to Sen. Kennedy's bill.

"I firmly believe reason will prevail," said Reginald K. Brack Jr., chairman, president and ceo of Time Inc. Magazine Co. "There is still enough compelling evidence offered at the hearings for these bills that it is unlikely legislators will render a legally sold product illegal to advertise."

However, during a speech in January before the Advertising Club of New York, Mr. Brack told his audience, "You know about the numerous legislative threats to tobacco advertising. If, and hopefully a big if, they reach the floor of the House, any one of them would pass with a landslide."

Mr. Brack insisted Time Warner has no formal plan for dealing with a tobacco ban.

"We do, in all of our planning, try to be conservative," he said.

The MPA's Mr. Guthrie pointed out that publishers have already been forced to lessen their dependency on tobacco in recent years.

According to Publishers Information Bureau figures, tobacco spending in magazines—which totaled $401.5 million last year—has been basically flat since 1983, rising a total of less than 1%. In the same period, total consumer magazine ad revenues rose 69% to $6.4 billion.

In 1983, tobacco was the second-largest magazine ad category in terms of revenue. Last year, it ranked sixth, behind No. 1 automotive, No. 2 toiletries and cosmetics, No. 3 business/consumer services, No. 4 direct response and No. 5 food.

The flat spending resulted from tobacco companies shifting spending from magazines to trade and consumer promotions, outdoor and regional efforts. Adding to the trend was R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co.'s decision to cut magazine spending by more than 25% in 1990.

"The long-term trend has been a downward appearance of tobacco advertising," said Bill Kerr, president of The New York Times Co. Magazine Group, publisher of Family Circle and McCall's, among others. "Tobacco is a market that will dwindle over time, so we have to work hard to bring in new categories, new lines of revenue."

"We recognize the possibility that tobacco advertising may be legislated away at some point," said Joseph Cece, president-publisher of TV Guide. "There's no grand plan, but it's in the back of every publisher's mind. What happens if this advertising goes away entirely?" □ own personality and wasn't supported by many Coca-Cola bottlers.

"It's a good brand, but a lot of people didn't give it a fair chance," said Morris Strickland, VP-sales and marketing at Quachita Coca-Cola Bottling, Monroe, La. "It has a stigma that it has to overcome. But once it's born on its own, then it's going to be possible as a fighting brand. . . . I'm excited about it. We're clearing the air for once and for all."

Coke II is the same formula as new Coke with a new package, a new name and new advertising via McCann-Erickson Worldwide, New York. The package is red with white lettering outlined in blue—the colors of the Pepsi can.

A Coca-Cola spokesman said Coke II will be positioned as having "real cola taste plus the sweetness of Pepsi," but he declined to discuss specifics about the advertising campaign.

Coke II is likely to turn the tables on Pepsi by making Pepsi appear old-fashioned. That's the same strategy Pepsi has been using on Coca-Cola Classic for years. Ads also are expected to name and directly attack Pepsi.

Some industry observers said Coca-Cola is making the changes to exorcise itself from the new Coke fiasco, which is raised each time the company tries to promote the brand.

"It's become a corporate embarrassment," one executive said.

Marketing executives were divided over whether Coke II is a good idea.

Mr. Ries of Trout & Ries said it's not a good strategy.

"Leaders ought to be leaders; they shouldn't be introducing me-too products," he said.

Some industry observers said Coca-Cola is making the changes to exorcise itself from the new Coke fiasco, which is raised each time the company tries to promote the brand.

But Allen McCusker, principal of the Canaan Parish Group, called the strategy a great idea. He said it will enable Coca-Cola to draw in young consumers and gain their loyalty early.

"It's always easier to move a consumer to another brand in the family than to get them to switch from one brand to another," he said. □

Heublein, Y&R split

FARMINGTON, Conn.—Heublein and Young & Rubicam announced Friday they will part ways effective June 15 on the estimated $15 million-to-$17 million Heublein account. A Heublein spokesman said the company wants "a new strategic direction for the brands as the beverage alcohol business becomes increasingly competitive." The account includes Jose Cuervo tequila, Finlandia vodka, Mouton-Cadet wines, Christian Brothers brandy, Heublein cocktails, Truffles liqueur, and Beaulieu Vineyard, Lancers and Inglenook wines. Cuervo was earlier rumored to be in jeopardy at Y&R, but Heublein denied it (AA, Oct. 8). Heublein hasn't begun a review but is "exploring all options" and hasn't ruled out going to a boutique shop. The company also said it hasn't decided whether it will appoint more than one agency for the brands. McCann-Erickson Worldwide, New York, is Heublein's other main agency.

Former exec hits RSCG

LONDON—KLP International Managing Director Gerry Postlethwaite said last week he's been fired by RSCG, which recently acquired KLP Group. Mr. Postlethwaite is threatening legal action against RSCG for breach of contract. He said he's also trying to recoup money owed to him through both a service contract and a separate sales contract arising from the 1988 sale of his 25% stake in KLP International to KLP Group. RSCG didn't return calls.

Ad-tax fight moves north to New York

By Jon Lafayette and Steven W. Colford

A plan to apply a 4% sales tax to advertising has surfaced in Madison Avenue's own back yard.

The proposal, still in the preliminary stages, from New York state Assemblyman Edward Sullivan (D., Manhattan) would tax newspaper, TV and radio advertising but not creative services. The tax would raise an estimated $252 million.

Assemblyman Sullivan floated his trial balloon in a letter to fellow lawmakers. The letter also raised the notion of taxing a list of other professional services.

"Tax-raising proposals such as Assemblyman Sullivan's require even greater vigilance from the ad community because the chief sponsor is a committee chairman," said Dennis Brown, executive director of the industry's State Advertising Coalition.

Assemblyman Sullivan, 56, chairman of the Committee on Higher Education, may see the tax as a means of providing more funds for education in the state.

New York is but the latest battleground for a growing number of tax initiatives aimed at advertising. The state appears to be picking up the baton barely a week after Kentucky Gov. Wallace Wilkinson backed down from his ad-tax legislation.

In addition to the Sullivan letter, New York Assemblywoman Nettie Mayersohn (D., Queens) has introduced a measure into the New York Assembly that would levy a 7% sales tax against creative services used to produce tobacco advertising.

"A sales tax will help to discourage the advertisement and sale of printed material that promotes and induces the use of cigarettes and other tobacco products medically proven to cause cancer," said a state memorandum attached to the Mayersohn bill.

The measure has been assigned to the Ways & Means Committee, but no hearing has been scheduled.

Nearby Rhode Island appears to be another hotbed of ad-tax legislation.

Sen. Richard Patterson (D., Providence) has introduced a measure to attach a 6% sales tax to classified advertising. The bill is under consideration by the Senate Finance Committee.

Sen. John Bevilacqua (D., Providence) is chief sponsor of a bill to repeal advertising's exemption from sales taxes.

Russell Dannecker, fiscal adviser to the state Senate, said that proposal could raise

Shops to clients: Pay up

4A's members call for an end to free services

By Jon Lafayette and Cleveland Horton

PALM DESERT, Calif.—Ad agencies are demanding that clients pay for services formerly provided free, and are getting even tougher with financially troubled clients.

The clarion call for this new get-tough attitude was sounded at the American Association of Advertising Agencies' annual meeting here by Martin Sorrell, chief executive of WPP Group.

"In every other business I know, marketing strategies of this kind demand huge and totally justified prices," Mr. Sorrell said. "In the agency business, however, we give them away with the ads."

He warned that agencies risk becoming little more than "ad factories" unless they start charging for the marketing and analysis they provide.

Mr. Sorrell's comments were in sharp contrast to Chrysler Corp. Chairman Lee Iacocca's call in 1987, when he asked the Four A's membership: "What have you done for us [clients] lately?"

"The worm has turned," Robert L. James, chairman-ceo of McCann-Erickson Worldwide, New York, said in an interview during the meeting. "Now we tell clients who want us to, say, put on a sales meeting for them, that they'll have to pay for it. It's not a trend yet, but it's the beginning of a trend."

Jack Kraft, Leo Burnett Co. vice chairman, said agencies are getting more "businesslike. . . . They are not as ashamed to talk about money."

He said Procter & Gamble Co.'s decision a year ago to pay agencies "fairly" for all services is a big factor in getting other clients to follow.

The other services include public relations, sales promotion, direct marketing and package design—all part of what Four A's President John O'Toole called "the new advertising."

The Four A's new chairman, DDB Needham Worldwide Chairman-CEO Keith Reinhard, said he hopes to invite some marketers to join a committee that would study examples of situations where integrated marketing has worked and where it hasn't.

"Structural reforms might be suggested on both sides, and compensation reforms might be indicated," Mr. Reinhard said. "If we can get our act together, we can build brands quicker. It would bring more revenues to the members and more

'Green' monster

Cry goes up for uniform ad standards

By Bob Geiger

ST. PAUL, Minn.—A cry for national ad standards for "green" marketing rose from the first environmental marketing forum.

Virtually every marketer who testified at the March 14-15 forum said national ad standards are needed to clear up the confusion.

The forum, drawing nearly 100 marketers, special-interest groups and representatives of state and federal governments, proved even advertisers disagree about claims that products are biodegradable or environmentally beneficial.

Kari Kamena, director of governmental affairs and public relations for Dow Chemical Co., said Dow has found that biodegradable plastics won't break down completely in landfills.

"I don't necessarily buy [Dow's finding], OK?" said Susan Shelton-Foley, VP-marketing of RMED International, marketer of "biodegradable" TenderCare disposable diapers.

Representatives of American Enviro Products, Archer Daniels Midland Co., First Brands Corp., James River Corp., Procter & Gamble Co., Webster Industries and others spoke before a panel that included representatives of eight state attorneys general and the Federal Trade Commission's Bureau of Consumer Protection.

"The fact that so many companies are here suggests the industry itself recognizes that there's confusion," said Barry Cutler, director of the FTC bureau. "I would be disappointed if private industry didn't act to establish [environmental marketing] guidelines and regulations."

Minnesota Attorney General Hubert H. Humphrey III, head of the group of attorneys general calling for environmental ad standards, opened by saying, "The promise of this green revolution is too important to squander. But already it is at risk—at risk from confusion, at risk from half-truths and innuendo, at risk from deception."

Green marketing is expected to sprout in the 1990s, fueled by concern for the earth's ozone layer and decreasing landfill capacity.

Phrases such as "environmentally friendly," "safe for the environment," "biodegradable" and "recyclable" presumably would require marketers to prove claims.

But definitions must be established before any federal or state regulations can be set. For example, First Brands' Glad plastic trash bags carry the claim "safe for the environment."

That doesn't mean they're biodegradable, said Patrick O'Brien, First Brands director of solid-waste issues management. He said it means Glad bags won't harm the environment if they're put in a landfill.

Robert Barrett, Mobil Chemical Co. general manager of solid-waste management solutions, acknowledged that advertisers are sending confusing messages to consumers. He also said he's disappointed Mobil isn't seen as a solution to the problem because it manufactures products included in the controversy.

Mobil's Hefty degradable trash bags are packed in a green box displaying an eagle and pine tree. On the back of the package is copy explaining that natural elements will break Hefty bags into "harmless particles" even after landfill burial. Packaging also contains a claim that Hefty bags are "a step in [Mobil's] commitment to a better environment."

But Mr. Barrett said Mobil doesn't promote Hefty bags as a solution to the landfill problem and could cite no studies about the rate of the bags' decomposition or safety in landfills.

P&G spokesman Robert Viney said his company avoids environmental symbols and isn't marketing degradable plastics because P&G determined that even so-called degradable plastics wouldn't degrade.

"We're taking what we call the high ground," he said, adding that P&G's solution to the landfill crisis is composting and other alternatives to landfill disposal of disposable diapers.

The task force represents the states of California, Massachusetts, Minnesota, Missouri, New York, Texas, Washington and Wisconsin. □

Saturn 'Springs' to action

By Raymond Serafin

Will "Spring in Spring Hill" be Saturn Corp.'s springboard into the marketplace this fall?

Advertising Age last week obtained a 65-second version of "Spring," the 23-minute film created last year by the agency for internal Saturn use. The tape was obtained through sources not directly connected with the company or agency Hal Riney & Partners.

The commercial-length version would seem to fit the requirements for a teaser spot.

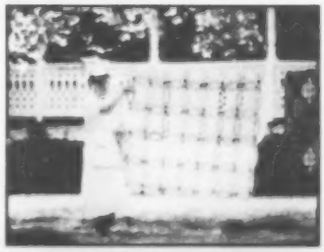
A teaser campaign would likely break on the West Coast, possibly about the first week of September, two months before the launch of the first two Saturn models.

Officials at General Motors Corp.'s Saturn unit and San Francisco-based Riney deny that creative direction has been decided.

"We're looking at a number of different options. ... There are probably 100 different ideas spinning around through the agency," said Thomas Shaver, director of marketing services for Saturn.

However, Mr. Riney, contacted at the annual meeting of the American Association of Advertising Agencies, said, "We'll probably be doing something like that."

The folksy footage obtained by Ad Age is adapted directly from the longer version about the start-up of Saturn's manufacturing complex in Spring Hill, Tenn.



The Saturn tape shows shots of the Tennessee countryside, townspeople hanging out laundry and a backlit shot of a Saturn car.

Visuals range from shots of the Tennessee countryside and townspeople painting the church and hanging out laundry, to backlit shots of a Saturn car.

"Pretty much the same as any spring ... but there is a difference," says Mr. Riney's voice-over, in a transition from shots of the rural town to industrial shots of the Saturn project.

"The events in this tiny town would sooner or later touch the lives of millions of Americans everywhere," the voice-over says, "because in Spring Hill, Tenn., they're making a brand new car. And it's not just a brand new car. It's a brand new car made in a brand new way."

The 23-minute version was first shown to the news media last July. At that time, Mr. Shaver acknowledged it could be used in initial Saturn advertising, though he said it was created primarily to address dealers, suppliers and employees.

Dealers have been enthusiastic about the film. One said recently he showed it to his bankers to help convince them to grant him a loan to build his new Saturn dealership.

Saturn and Riney officials in the past have expressed a desire to communicate the unusual Saturn story in advertising, presumably as a way to boost awareness and generate positive feelings about the brand before the first

Levi's Spikes 501 ads

Hot young director is Dektor's successor

By Marcy Magiera

Levi Strauss & Co. is replacing award-winning director Leslie Dektor with Spike Lee of Nike fame.

The filmmaker, known for "Do the Right Thing" and "She's Gotta Have It," will direct a back-to-school campaign for Levi's 501 jeans, sources said.

Mr. Lee's new commercial work and his new movie, "Variations on the Mo' Better Blues," will hit about the same time this summer.

Levi's confirmed that agency Foote, Cone & Belding, San Francisco, was talking to Mr. Lee but denied a contract had been signed with the director.

"I know that [FCB] has been talking to Spike Lee," said Dan Chew, Levi's marketing manager. "It's true to form for them to be out there trying to do something cutting edge."

The marketer "hasn't seen FCB's final recommendations," Mr. Chew said, adding that any new campaign will continue under the "Levi's 501 USA" theme.

Levi's broke "Levi's 501 USA" last July as a change of venue, from urban to rural settings, rather than a change of direction. Created by Mike Koelker, FCB exec VP-creative director, and Mr. Dektor, the radio and TV effort kept the look and feel of the long-running "501 blues" ads.

But the look might change significantly now, Mr. Dektor said.

"My look is so observational and very objective; Spike Lee's style is very subjective," said Mr. Dektor, who said he will no longer be involved with 501. "If they're going with Spike Lee, the work will be right opposite. It won't be observational; it'll be right in your face. . . . I think that's what they'll do."

Mr. Dektor said he was offered assignments on other Levi's products but declined because he's shooting other commercials through July and then will direct a feature film.

Mr. Dektor attributed the change in the Levi's campaign to the fact a new creative team is working on 501.

Though Mr. Koelker oversees all Levi's work, the campaign will be under the direct supervision of FCB Group Creative Director Peter Angelos.

Mr. Angelos and Alan Jewett, FCB's VP-management supervisor on the account, weren't available for comment.

Mr. Lee's only other advertising work is Nike's Air Jordan campaign from Wieden & Kennedy, Portland, Ore., which he directs and appears in as Mars Blackmon, a character he created for "She's Gotta Have It."

He reportedly won't appear in the Levi's campaign. □

Budweiser pools promotion efforts

Anheuser-Busch will give away 100 pools featuring the Budweiser logo.

By Ira Teinowitz

Anheuser-Busch is tossing away its traditional series of Budweiser summer promotions in favor of what the company says is the biggest single-theme promotion in A-B history.

The promotion, touting Bud, Bud Light and new Bud Dry, revolves around a giveaway of 100 full-size, built-in swimming pools adorned with giant Budweiser labels, similar to those featured in some earlier Bud TV spots.

Comedian Jeff Altman will be featured in TV spots for the promotion.

Spending for the promotional effort will top $30 million, in addition to the estimated $65 million A-B will spend on Bud Dry's introduction starting April 2.

D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles, St. Louis, is handling advertising for the promotion; Waylon Co. handles promotional efforts.

A-B is jettisoning such past promotional staples as its "Pick a Pair" effort for Budweiser and Bud Light and giving up its 3-year-old sponsorship (with USA Today) of Major League Baseball's all-star game balloting.

Instead of unrelated Memorial Day, July Fourth and Labor Day promotions, A-B will run point-of-purchase efforts for those holidays tied to the main pool theme.

A-B officials declined to reveal a break date or spending level for the promotion. However, the company's spending on past summer promotions has exceeded $30 million annually.

Tom Sharbaugh, group brand director, said A-B hopes using one promotional theme will reinforce the individual efforts.

In formally unveiling Bud Dry's rollout last week, August A. Busch IV, Bud Dry brand manager and son of the company's chairman, said ad spending for the introduction will be

Tobacco ad ban for EC members clears first hurdle

By Andrew Rosenbaum

A proposal to ban tobacco advertising in the European Community—a move that could cost the ad industry hundreds of millions of dollars—edged closer to becoming law last week.

The European Parliament voted 170-111, with 17 abstentions, to ban all tobacco advertising and sponsorship. A majority of the 12-member Council of Ministers, expected to vote within three months, must approve the proposal.

If approved, the law would prohibit tobacco marketers from advertising their products in any medium or using any tobacco product logo in sporting or cultural events. The measure would take effect Jan. 1, 1991.

Should that happen, the European Advertising Tripartite, a Brussels-based ad industry organization, would fight the ban in the EC Court of Justice, said Alastair Tempest, the group's director general.

Final approval of the proposal isn't certain, Mr. Tempest said. West Germany, Greece and the U.K. have already come out against the bill, he said. He also believes Denmark, the Netherlands and France would oppose it.

Still, he conceded that passage by the European Parliament is a significant step.

Ironically, the proposed ban isn't the result of anti-tobacco lobbying. Instead, it's an effort to establish a uniform tobacco ad regulation as part of the EC's preparations for dropping all trade barriers by 1992.

Although all EC members have already banned most forms of tobacco advertising on TV, regulations differ greatly on print advertising. The EC legislators fear if a total ban isn't imposed, one country might impound foreign magazines and newspapers that don't conform to its regulations.

Industry experts fear the bill, if approved, could threaten many

Pert Plus pops to No. 1

P&G brand beats own Head & Shoulders

By Laurie Freeman

Procter & Gamble Co.'s Pert Plus is an overnight sensation, after 10 long years.

The combination shampoo and conditioner has taken the No. 1 position in the $1.4 billion shampoo category, supplanting P&G's longtime leader, Head & Shoulders. And the brand is still gaining strength, industry sources say.

Observers are calling Pert Plus one of the biggest success stories ever in the category.

"This is a case where the technology works, the advertising clearly defines the image and consumers pick up on it," said Suzanne Grayson, a marketing consultant.

Pert Plus was originally introduced in 1980 as Pert and was what P&G executives called a "problem brand" until 1987.

At that time, P&G reintroduced it with the two-in-one technology, combining shampoo and conditioner; the new name; and new advertising with a $20 million budget. It has since climbed the ladder rapidly in the fiercely competitive business.

By the end of last year, Pert Plus held a 12% share, assuming the top spot from Head & Shoulders, with 9.5%. During that year, Pert Plus' share soared from the 6.5% recorded at the end of 1988, when it was No. 2.

The 5.5-point jump, sources say, is due to a favorable review last year in Consumer Reports, plus the August '89 introduction of a dandruff-control version.

Another factor was the continuing strong media support from P&G for an ad campaign via Leo Burnett USA, Chicago, that's changed little since 1987.

"Pert Plus' strategy is simple," said Jay Freedman, household products analyst at Kidder, Peabody & Co. "It appeals to active men and women who don't have a few extra minutes to spend

Burned by '89, retailers pare ad hikes: survey

By Alison Fahey

Faced with cooling consumer spending and a lukewarm economy, retailers plan to increase ad budgets less in 1990 than in 1989.

Overall ad spending, excluding cooperative efforts, will rise an average of 2% in 1990, according to the Retail Advertising & Marketing Association's second annual survey of members' retail ad plans. The RAMA study was mailed to 380 members and had a response rate of 20%.

Despite pressure to cut operating costs, retailers said in 1989 they would boost ad spending nearly 4% over 1988.

Co-op budgets also appear to be thinning, with retailers predicting a meager 2% increase in 1990 compared with an estimated 6% last year.

Leo J. Shapiro, president of a marketing research company that bears his name, said retailers ended up increasing budgets more than the projected 4% last year, and that an overabundance of advertising was devoted to promoting price reductions and sales.

"It's like a New Year's resolution," he said. "Most retailers got burned last year [by heavy price promoting] so it's more of a reaction to mistakes of last year than a promise for 1990."

Doug Raymond, RAMA president, said retailers are diverting ad funds and co-op dollars from traditional media into special events, in-store merchandising and promotions.

Projected ad spending increases

Type of store	1990	1989
Large dept. stores	2.0%	3.0%
Small dept. stores	2.0	(1.1)
Mass merchandisers	(1.0)	5.2
Specialty clothing	0.0	1.0
Home furnishings	3.0	3.9
Home hardware	3.0	8.0
Other specialty	7.0	3.1
Other retail	1.0	8.6
Total	2.1	3.9

"There's a certain amount of trepidation with everything that's happened in the last 12 to 18 months," he said, referring to some retail chains' financial woes, most notably Campeau Corp.'s Federated Department Stores and Allied Stores Corp.

The RAMA survey found ad spending plans vary greatly by retail category.

For example, women's, men's and children's specialty stores reported flat spending for 1990, while other specialty stores, which include optimistic toy retailers, reported a boost of 7% in 1990.

Mass merchandisers reported a 1% budget decrease in 1990, while large department stores said they would increase spending 2%.

"We have entered a very frugal shopping climate," said Kurt Barnard, publisher of Retail Marketing Report.

Spending plans also varied by media type, with broadcast advertising on the upswing. In 1990, retailers plan to spend 12% of their overall ad budget on broadcast TV, up from a projected 10.8% in 1989.

"TV spending reduces the number of items that you can cut prices on," Mr. Shapiro said. "When you begin to cut prices in newspaper [ads] you tend to feature a lot of products."

But newspapers are still the favorite advertising medium, with retailers spending 36% and 17% of their overall 1990 ad budget on newspaper run-of-press and inserts, respectively. □

Catalogers feeling the squeeze: Retailers' heavy promotional activity is eating away at catalog sales. Catalogs started losing appeal during last year's holiday season, according to a recent study by the NPD Group's Home Testing Institute. Thirty-six percent of survey respondents said they were using catalogs less during last year's holiday season than they did the previous year; only 12% said they were using catalogs more.

Units is expanding beyond knitwear with new fabrics and styles for the '90s.

Units stretches out: To make sure one of the hottest fashion trends of the 1980s keeps pace with the '90s, Units is extending its modular knit apparel line to include new fabrics, styles and accessories. The J.C. Penney Co. subsidiary this spring has added woven fabrics, such as voile, to its collection, as well as scarves, lace collars and leather belts. The new items will be showcased in print ads in the April and May issues of Glamour and Ladies' Home Journal. Ads are handled in-house.

Promotion blooms at Bloomies: Despite the mounting troubles of parent Federated Stores, Bloomingdale's is forging ahead with several major marketing partnerships.

Nissan Motor Corp. USA's Infiniti division will sponsor a promotion heralding the fall reopening of the retailer's men's department. Magazine inserts, newspaper ads and a major catalog will support. Separately, this month Du Pont Co. and Bloomingdale's broke a promotion for Lycra, including newspaper ads and a catalog. And in April, it will join American Express Travel Related Services for a seven-week promotion celebrating Broadway theater.

Gordon Cooke, Bloomingdale's exec VP, said the chain is committed to keeping its aggressive marketing posture. "If anything, we've decided to embellish our activities, not restrict them," he said. Despite the Chapter 11 bankruptcy filing by Federated, a unit of Campeau Corp., Bloomingdale's still plans to spend $50 million on advertising this year, up 3% to 5% from last year, Mr. Cooke said.

Grey Advertising, New York, handles broadcast advertising; print is handled in-house.

CBS signs Ford

Winter Olympic ad deal worth $43M

By Wayne Walley

Ford Motor Co. has agreed to pay CBS a combined $43 million in commercial time for the 1992 and 1994 Winter Olympics, sources say.

Neither Ford nor CBS would comment on the deal, but industry sources say Ford is buying $20 million in ad time for the '92 Games in Albertville, France, and $23 million for the '94 Games in Lillehammer, Norway.

Ford joins Chrysler Corp., which closed the first Winter Olympics ad deal with CBS earlier this year, agreeing to buy a combined $106 million in commercial time (AA, Jan. 29).

The two automakers will account for 70% of the Olympic inventory set aside by CBS for the automotive category. The network has pitched most import car marketers but has yet to strike a deal for any of the remaining ad time in the category.

Sources say a major stumbling block for CBS among imports is the $63 million price tag the network is seeking for the remaining 30%.

Some importers also believe their customers watch baseball, basketball and football, and thus concentrate sports buys there instead of the Olympics.

In addition, CBS' refusal to offer ratings guarantees for the Olympics may be causing import car marketers to hesitate.

"The guarantee situation is subject to negotiation, but if you don't have a 'grandfather clause' on guarantees, [CBS Marketing President] Tom Leahy's position is no guarantees on all sports," said a buyer who requested anonymity.

As with Chrysler, Ford likely will take advantage of such marketing support programs as print ads in Olympic guides and Olympic-themed free standing inserts produced by CBS.

With auto category sales almost complete, CBS will now target official Olympic sponsors.

As stipulated in its broadcast rights agreements with the International Olympic Committee, CBS must give official Olympic sponsors "full access to Olympic broadcasts," offering them a right of first refusal for category exclusivity.

Official sponsors include marketers signed by the International Olympic Committee for The Olympic Program, as well as others that buy sponsorships for specific countries.

Sponsors of The Olympic Program—including Coca-Cola Co., Eastman Kodak Co., 3M, Ricoh Corp., Matsushita and the U.S. Postal Service's international express mail service—aren't required to buy airtime, but most do to leverage the more than $14 million fee charged to be an official sponsor. □

Team One ticking on

By Cleveland Horton

Team One, the Saatchi & Saatchi DFS division established to handle Toyota Motor Sales USA's Lexus division, will unveil its first non-car creative effort this week.

The El Segundo, Calif., agency recently picked up the $2 million Artime USA account, and this week will launch a national print, spot TV and outdoor campaign for Artime's Sector Sport watches.

The ads attempt to create a brand awareness for the Swiss-built timepieces by focusing on their logo: an eagle.

Print ads, appearing in April issues of Esquire, GQ and M, feature a large photo of an eagle with the headline, "If you're lucky, it will land on your arm."

The 30-second TV spot that broke this week in New York during sports programming on CBS uses the same theme. The commercial opens with slow-motion footage of a tawny eagle in flight. The picture of the bird dissolves into an extreme close-up of the face of the watch, with the sweep-second hand ticking by.

"It's important to brand the name," said Marcia Bernhardt, VP at the company. "It makes a connection with the logo. I don't care if they forget the Sector name, as long as they go into the store and say, 'I want the eagle watch.' "

Sector Sport watches, distinctive by their rugged, thick look, are priced between $300 and $900.

Saatchi's Team One and Artime USA give the company's eagle logo life in an attempt to build brand awareness for the Swiss timepieces.

Artime, the U.S. marketing arm of Italy's oldest watch company, is trying to tap into what it sees as a growing market for timepieces as fashion accessories.

About 200 million watches are sold in the U.S. each year; 72% of all watches are priced less than $75. Some 200 brands compete for share. Artime USA has set a sales goal of 50,000 units this year.

Currently, Sector is distributed to independent and chain jewelry stores as well as several jewelry showrooms within department stores.

Artime USA also markets watches under the Lucien Rochat (price range: $8,500 to $18,000) and Tabbah ($2,500 to $90,000) brands. Team One is handling media and creative for Lucien Rochat, and buys media for Tabbah.

Although not necessarily in size, the Artime account represents a model client for Team One, said Shirley Dion, senior VP-business development.

The agency wants to trade on its knowledge of the upscale market, gleaned in its work for Lexus, in attracting other marketers of upscale products and services, she said. □ washing and conditioning their hair."

Industry sources also say P&G's two-in-one shampoo and conditioner technology is winning increased share in international markets. The technology is in a brand called Rejoy in Japan, Rejoice in mainland Asia, Pert 2-in-1 in Australia, Vidal Sassoon Wash & Go in the U.K. and continental Europe and Pantene Plus in parts of Europe.

In Japan, Rejoy leads the two-in-one segment with a 6% share. Two-in-one products now account for almost 25% of the Japanese shampoo market, industry sources say. Overall, Shiseido Co. has a 9% share with three brands: Rinpoo, Men's Rinpoo and Morning Fresh Speedy.

While share data for Europe were unavailable, industry sources said Vidal Sassoon Wash & Go's share in the U.K. is in the mid-teens.

Not only is P&G exporting the two-in-one technology, but the company is using virtually the same ad strategy, sampling program, copy and format in every country where the product is marketed.

Burnett's offices or affiliates handle the combination product worldwide.

TV commercials airing in the U.K. resemble those in the U.S. In both countries, spots appropriately titled "Locker" show either a man or a woman in a locker room explaining that they no longer tote both shampoo and conditioner to the gym. Instead, they "wash and go" by using Pert Plus (in the U.S.) or Vidal Sassoon Wash & Go.

Burnett has done 11 versions of the same commercial, "one for every country [in which] they sell" it, an agency source said. □

FOR THE RECORD

GENERAL FOODS USA is running a new network TV campaign for ground roast Maxwell House coffee. The effort substitutes "America loves Maxwell House" for the disputed theme line, "America prefers the taste of Maxwell House." The change comes following rival Procter & Gamble Co.'s complaint to the networks that the original campaign saying Maxwell House won out over P&G's Folgers in taste tests was unfair. D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles, New York, handles Maxwell House.

NABISCO BRANDS last week settled a dispute with 10 state attorneys general over ad campaigns for Fleischmann's margarine, Nabisco 100% Bran and Nabisco Shredded Wheat. The states contended the ads contained misleading health claims. Nabisco didn't declare guilt but agreed to give $135,000 to pay for the investigation. A spokesman said all the ads had been off the air since at least August. FCB/Leber Katz Partners, New York, is the agency.

CENTURY 21 REAL ESTATE CORP., Irvine, Calif., last week put its $30 million account up for review. A list of contenders is expected within a month. The company said it wants to check other options but isn't dissatisfied with incumbent McCann-Erickson Worldwide, Los Angeles, which is in the review.

COCA-COLA CO. in mid-May breaks a $100 million marketing program for Coca-Cola Classic featuring a specially patented can that contains up to $200 or a prize voucher for trips, tickets or other giveaways. The MagiCans are indistinguishable from other Coca-Cola Classic cans, though they contain water rather than soft drinks. The prize pops up when the can is opened. Included in the promotion are a cruise sweepstakes and multimedia ads using the pop group New Kids on the Block. Coca-Cola said this is the biggest promotion ever for Coca-Cola Classic. McCann-Erickson Worldwide, New York, is Coca-Cola Classic's ad agency.

FEDERAL COMMUNICATIONS Commission is giving the TV networks and Hollywood studios a chance to work out their dispute over the financial interest and syndication rules. Under the FCC timetable, the two sides have until June 14; then, the commission will decide what changes, if any, should be made in the rules. Hollywood wants to keep rules that prohibit the networks from producing and selling their own shows into syndication. The networks say they're suffering financially from the ownership and profit-participation prohibitions.

OAK BROOK, Ill.—McDonald's this week will add cold cereal and bran muffins to its breakfast menu in selected markets, including Chicago. The cereal effort involves single-serving boxes of General Mills' Cheerios and Wheaties. Chicago Bulls star Michael Jordan's role as ad spokesman for both McDonald's and Wheaties influenced the choice of the cereal, sources said. Kellogg, with a much larger foodservice division than General Mills, has been discussing a similar venture with McDonald's for the past several years. Leo Burnett USA, Chicago, handles McDonald's.

Campbell sets shop cuts

CAMDEN, N.J.—Campbell Soup Co. will inform shops this week about its finalized agency consolidation and incentive compensation system. Core shops are Backer Spielvogel Bates, BBDO Worldwide, DDB Needham Worldwide and Ogilvy & Mather, all New York; W.B. Doner & Co., Southfield, Mich.; and Hal Riney & Partners, San Francisco. Measured media spending is estimated at more than $500 million.

General Motors Corp.'s plans for a corporate ad campaign targeting quality has touched off a controversy at the No. 1 automaker.

The estimated $40 million effort is designed to bring back customers who bought GM vehicles when their quality lagged behind that of competitors. But its direction and origin is creating heated exchanges between division and corporate executives, sources say.

Already angered by forced cuts estimated to be at least $80 million in division ad budgets, some division executives are sore at the usurping of marketing responsibilities by corporate headquarters.

More important, however, some division executives believe a campaign trumpeting GM quality gains isn't only premature, but will draw unwanted attention to how far GM quality had slipped.

The drive, themed "GM puts quality on the road," is expected to start about the second week of April. McCann-Erickson Worldwide, New York, created the campaign and is developing it with regular corporate agency N W Ayer.

"If you say you improved your quality, it's like saying you stopped drinking and abusing your wife. If you talk about 99% reliability, the customer wonders about the 1%."

"We're trying to send a message to people who've said they'd never buy another GM car that we're worth another look," said one source familiar with the effort.

GM corporate officials have declined comment on the campaign, but interviews with divisional and agency officials, who spoke on condition of anonymity, provided a glimpse into the internal debate.

"The statistics they're talking about using in the campaign can be perceived very negatively," one source said. "If you say you improved your quality, it's like saying you stopped drinking and abusing your wife. If you talk about 99% reliability, the customer wonders about the 1%."

An agency source echoed the theme.

Nissan turbo, Reebok bungee spots off the air

By Pat Sloan and Cleveland Horton

Reebok International may have to eat sizable production costs if the Chiat/Day/Mojo-created bungee-jumping TV spot never bounces back onto the airwaves.

But Reebok won't be alone.

Nissan Motor Corp. USA, another Chiat client, has agreed not to run a pricey 300ZX Turbo spot anymore, even though it was directed by Ridley Scott.

So far, Reebok's commercial has run four times; Nissan's ran once. That means the two advertisers may have spent more than $1 million combined in production fees for commercials that received little airtime and a lot of controversy.

Reebok's bungee spot was pulled after consumer complaints; Bob Garfield's Ad Review talks about why—Page 52.

The Nissan spot cost an estimated $750,000 to produce.

The Insurance Institute for Highway Safety, a lobbying group, last week claimed a victory when it received a letter from Nissan Motor Co. Chairman Takashi Ishihara assuring that the Turbo spot "will not air again."

Institute President Brian O'Neill had called the Turbo spot one of the worst examples of speed advertising he'd ever seen.

The institute said it was joined by 18 other safety groups in its efforts to oppose the commercial.

A Nissan spokesman said, "I have to

Sponsors shine at Oscars

By Wayne Walley

It's not the Super Bowl, but it's close.

Tonight's 62nd annual Academy Awards telecast on ABC will be an advertising launch pad second only to pro football's extravaganza.

Most of the gala's nine sponsors, including AT&T Co., General Motors Corp., Revlon, McDonald's Corp. and Coca-Cola USA will use the Oscars to showcase new commercials.

"The Academy Awards is there to honor the best, so it's a very nice environment for a [campaign] launch," said Dannielle Colliver, Chevrolet's advertising manager-passenger cars.

The only sponsors that aren't expected to air at least one new spot during the telecast are Prudential Insurance Co. of America, caught in the middle of an agency change; Eastman Kodak Co., waiting till June to launch a new promotion tied to Disney characters; and Campbell Soup Co. The ninth sponsor, J.C. Penney Co., plans at least one new execution of a repositioning campaign that broke on the program last year.

Each 30-second spot in the live telecast, starting at 9 p.m. (ET) and hosted this year by comedian Billy Crystal, sold for $425,000, a 13% increase from 1989.

With the hoopla surrounding the Best Picture, Best Actor and Best Actress awards and the best-dressed attendees, the Oscars year in and year out offer advertisers a vehicle usually only surpassed by the Super Bowl —or, in some years, the Grammy Awards—for introducing major new campaigns or products.

FDA readies notices on errant food claims

By Laurie Freeman

WASHINGTON—The Food & Drug Administration is poised to send regulatory letters to several food marketers it believes are making claims outside the boundaries of proposed rules on label health messages.

Food marketers making claims for oat bran and no-cholesterol products head the FDA's hit list.

"It won't be today and it won't be tomorrow, but it will be very soon," FDA Chief of Staff Joseph Levitt said last week before a food industry conference. "We are in the process of collecting labels to see which we should call manufacturers' attention to."

The FDA letters will "explicitly demonstrate the areas we believe exceed the boundaries" for health claims on food labels, Mr. Levitt said.

The chosen companies will be "examples" of how the FDA will enforce its health claims policy in the interim period before the proposed food-label guidelines become final, he said.

"We urge all companies to check these examples against their own [product] labels," Mr. Levitt said.

Since no health claims rule has ever been finalized, the FDA has the authority to challenge any such claims under existing regulations.

Although Mr. Levitt declined to identify the companies during a conference held by the independent Food, Drug & Law Institute, other FDA officials hinted that the first enforcement actions could be taken against oat bran products.

Ed Scarbrough, acting director of FDA's Office of Nutrition & Food Sciences, said claims for oat bran, especially in some cereals, doughnuts, cookies and pretzels, "are inappropriate based on the level of oat bran present" in those foods.

"We intend to take action soon against the most egregious claims," he said.

"We urge all companies to check these [food label] examples against their own [product] labels."

Food industry executives believe the FDA will target high-fiber cereals and foods such as peanut butter and cooking oils that make no-cholesterol claims even though many may contain high amounts of saturated fat.

"Nearly every example they [FDA] give when they talk about health claims is either oat bran cereals, psyllium-based cereals or no-cholesterol/saturated-fat products," said a food company executive who requested anonymity.

The proposed new policy would allow health claims only about fiber and colon cancer; fiber and heart disease; fats and cancer; fats and heart disease; sodium and high blood pressure; and calcium and osteoporosis.

The 60-day comment period on the proposal closes April 9, but the FDA expects companies and interested organizations will file petitions to extend the comment period.

The new policy could take a year to implement after the final rule is published in the Federal Register. Marketers' comments will be taken into consideration before the final rule is published.

The proposed regulations would require marketers to support all claims with FDA-approved summaries of scientific evidence. The FDA said it will rely primarily on the 1988 Surgeon General's Report on Nutrition & Health and research endorsed by the National Academy of Sciences in evaluating claims.

The FDA's Mr. Scarbrough, however, admitted the agency won't know "how much or what kinds of evidence" will be needed to substantiate health claims until the FDA starts enforcing the policy.

Quaker Oats Co., which aggressively advertises the beneficial aspects of its oatmeal and oat bran cereals, intends to defend its position in comments to the FDA.

Thomas Howell, Quaker's VP-general corporate counsel, said the marketer's comments will emphasize that the "overwhelming body of research on oats and cholesterol reduction meets the [FDA's] test for significant scientific agreement" and that the company should be allowed to continue making that claim. □

'Newsweek' taps Eldredge

By Scott Donaton

NEW YORK—The appointment of Peter Eldredge as U.S. publisher of Newsweek shows the publication wants a more aggressive presence on Madison Avenue, industry observers say.

Mr. Eldredge, 45, VP-group sales at Murdoch Magazines since last December, will join Newsweek April 2.

He previously was publisher of Premiere, publisher of the Star and ad director at New York Magazine.

The Washington Post Co. newsweekly also announced last week that Worldwide Publisher Howard Smith, 55, a 25-year veteran, will retire at yearend.

Mr. Eldredge and Peter Luffman, president of Newsweek International, will report to Mr. Smith until his retirement. After Mr. Smith leaves, both executives will report directly to Newsweek President Alan Spoon.

Industry insiders speculate Mr. Spoon, who assumed the president's post last September, wants a greater role in the title's day-to-day operations.

"Alan Spoon had an understanding with [Washington Post Co. Chairman] Katharine Graham that he was going to be a cowboy and do things his own way," said one source close to the company.

"I suspect it has to do with Alan Spoon," added Joseph Ostrow, exec VP-worldwide media director at Foote, Cone & Belding. "It may well be he's putting his own team in place."

P. Eldredge

Referring to speculation that Mr. Spoon forced Mr. Smith's retirement, Mr. Ostrow said: "If you look at the performance of the magazine, it's not exactly skyrocketing, and sometimes when the team's not playing well, the manager gets the boot."

But Mr. Smith insisted the decision was his own.

"After 25 years of running around the world, I'm getting tired and that's the honest truth," he said. "Alan's been vociferous in his efforts to get me to stay."

Mr. Spoon was out of the country at press time and couldn't be reached for comment. In a prepared statement, he said, "Howard Smith's contributions to Newsweek's success have been both far-ranging and of fundamental importance. We'll miss him greatly."

Newsweek, despite record ad revenues of $255.9 million last year, a 5.9% gain, is perceived by many in the ad community as the most vulnerable major newsweekly.

The magazine's ad pages were flat in 1989 for the second straight year at 2,495.3, Publishers Information Bureau figures showed. Through February, ad pages were off 13.7% to 308.5. Ad revenues were down 5.7% for the same period to $33.2 million.

Before joining Murdoch in 1984, Mr. Eldredge was at Time Inc. Magazine Co.'s Money for eight years, serving in posts ranging from corporate ad director to special projects director.

"I think Peter brings two things to the Newsweek organization," Mr. Ostrow said. "One, he's an old Time Inc. man and a little of that understanding can do Newsweek good. Two, his knowledge of how to deal with advertisers and agencies, his street smarts, will help them. He's going to be out in the streets, pushing and selling."

Page Thompson, exec VP-media director at DDB Needham Worldwide, labeled Mr. Eldredge's appointment to the vacant post "an excellent move."

"Peter's a great publishing person with a varied experience. I don't think they could've picked a better person," he said.

Mr. Eldredge referred queries to Newsweek and said only, "This is a great opportunity to work for a very prestigious organization. It will be a real exciting challenge." □

Busch Cold-Filtered Draft (r.), complete with bottles resembling Miller Genuine Draft's, is testing in Tulsa.

Draft beer look-alike

A-B brings out another rival to Miller

By Ira Teinowitz

Anheuser-Busch is testing what may be the ultimate weapon—a look-alike—in its fight to seize the initiative from Miller Brewing Co.'s fast-growing Miller Genuine Draft.

The No. 1 brewer last week began test marketing Busch Cold-Filtered Draft in Tulsa, Okla. Unlike Busch Light Draft, which rolled out last month, the new entry is packaged in a clear bottle and has a black label. Those are prominent features of Miller Genuine Draft.

One difference is that Busch is priced lower than Genuine Draft.

A-B in the past has marketed all its beers in brown bottles. The company has said light streaming through clear bottles could affect the hops and that the only alternative was to switch to chemically altered hop extracts that were less sensitive to light.

Since then, A-B has developed six-pack packaging that completely blocks out light, and its research has shown people like clear bottles.

Initial advertising for Busch, from DDB Needham Worldwide, Chicago, will be in newspapers, but long-term marketing decisions haven't been made yet.

This is A-B's third—and most direct—attack on Miller Genuine Draft this year.

Earlier this year, A-B expanded Busch Light Draft, its first packaged draft beer, to distribution in the 46 states in which Busch beers are distributed.

Also, A-B executives recently acknowledged that one of the targets for Bud Dry, a draft product now being introduced nationally, is Miller Genuine Draft.

Miller claims Genuine Draft, now the 10th best-selling beer in the U.S., is continuing to grow at double-digit rates that make its growth pace the fastest among the nation's leading brews.

Backer Spielvogel Bates Worldwide, New York, handles Genuine Draft.

Last year, Genuine Draft sold 4.7 million barrels, up 20.5%, reported Beer Marketer's Insights. □

Minute Maid claims OJ lead

By Jennifer Lawrence and Judann Dagnoli

Coca-Cola Foods is juicing up Minute Maid, claiming the brand has moved into first place in the $3 billion orange juice market.

A letter to the Coca-Cola Co. unit's employees from President-CEO Harry E. Teasley Jr. said Nielsen Marketing Research Group's ScanTrack data show Minute Maid as the "undisputed" leader.

But Tropicana Products disputed the claim and said Arbitron/SAMI figures show that Tropicana, a unit of Jos. E. Seagram & Sons, is No. 1.

Martin Gutfreund, Tropicana VP-administration, questioned the timing of Mr. Teasley's letter and its release to the media, citing Tropicana's annual three-day meeting with citrus growers that starts March 27.

"Could [the letter] be part of a plot to steal thunder from our upcoming event?" Mr. Gutfreund asked.

Pierre Ferrari, Coca-Cola Foods' senior VP-consumer marketing, readily admitted there's no coincidence.

"We're puzzled by [Tropicana's] continuing assertion that they are No. 1," he said. "We are by far the larger producer and marketer of OJ. We are getting a little irritated" with Tropicana.

Tropicana said its numbers would support the company's leadership claim, but the data couldn't be supplied to Advertising Age by press time.

Mr. Teasley's letter recaps Minute Maid's 1989 performance, citing the figures based on ScanTrack data:

- Minute Maid orange juice retail volume was up nearly 19%.
- Minute Maid's share of the U.S. retail orange juice business for the 52 weeks ended Jan. 27 was 23.4%, "up 1.3 points from a year earlier and [plus] 0.3 points vs. our nearest competitor." The market is made up of frozen concentrate and chilled, ready-to-drink OJ.
- Minute Maid narrowed the gap with the chilled segment leader (Tropicana) "with a 21.8% share for Minute Maid, up 2.7 points from a year earlier and [plus] 1.3 points vs. the leader."

The company is "making progress toward our goal to become No. 1 overall in chilled orange juice," Mr. Teasley said in the letter. ". . . Coca-Cola Foods, through the Minute Maid brand, is the undisputed leader of the orange juice business in the U.S., and that lead is increasing." □

Coke, Pepsi take top ad-recall spots

By Kate Fitzgerald

The latest round of cola wars made Coca-Cola and Pepsi-Cola solid winners in last month's ad recall race.

Coca-Cola was No. 1 on the list of the best-recalled advertising for February, closely followed by Pepsi-Cola, Advertising Age's monthly adWatch survey found. Both cola marketers broke major campaigns during the Jan. 28 Super Bowl.

Diet Coke made its first appearance ever among the 10 best-recalled ads in January and last month moved up to fourth place, tied with Anheuser-Busch's Budweiser, from ninth.

Infiniti, riding on the fumes of its mysterious "rocks and trees" campaign, made the top 10 again, though the luxury cars from Nissan Motor Corp. USA slid to eighth from fifth place.

AdWatch is a joint project of Ad Age and the Gallup Organizaton. Advertising awareness is measured by asking a nationally projectable sample to name the first advertising that comes to mind from all seen, heard or read in the

AA picks Best Print ads

CHICAGO—Ten finalists have been selected in Advertising Age's Best Print Ads of 1989 competition.

The Best Magazine Ad and Best Newspaper Ad, selected from entries submitted by agencies, advertisers and Ad Age staffers, will be announced at the fifth annual Ad Age Awards Dinner, hosted by comedian Jerry Seinfeld April 26 at the Chicago Marriott Downtown.

Best Magazine Ad finalists:

- Eastman Kodak Co., b&w film (Rumrill-Hoyt)—Striking close-up photo by Gregory Heisler of Luis Sarria, former masseur to Muhammad Ali, shows wonderful facial detail. Photo plus the headline, "The soul of black and white," underscore quality of Kodak's b&w film.
- Procter & Gamble Co., Pepto-Bismol tablets (Leo Burnett USA)—Color photo of restaurant's chalk-printed "slate" menu lists greasy foods—hamburger, chili dog, bratwurst, cheese nachos, onion rings, etc. The lower right-hand corner has a picture of a box of Pepto-Bismol tablets and the line, "The one that coats is the only one you need."
- Donna Karan New York, hosiery (Arnell/Bickford Associates)—Striking b&w photo showing only a woman's crossed, hose-clad legs as she reclines on a chair. Reminiscent of photographer Man Ray's style.
- Blue Diamond Growers, almonds (Saatchi & Saatchi DFS/-Pacific)—Humorous color spread depicts purported gourmet treats featuring almonds: "Amande Suisse" (almond with chocolate sauce dabbed on it); "Pasta alle Mandorle" (almond with one strip of pasta wrapped around it); "Nachos y Alemdaras" (almond and cheese on nacho), etc.
- Stanley Tools (Della Femina, McNamee WCRS)—Page ad headlined "Some rules aren't made to be broken" has a 25-foot, yellow metal tape measure winding through long copy that stresses durability of Stanley tools.

Best Newspaper Ad finalists:

- Midway Airlines (Campbell-Mithun-Esty)—Partial page b&w ad with liberal use of white space is headlined "Avoid the ORDeal," using a baggage tag from Chicago's O'Hare International Airport (ORD) as part of the headline. The point, underscored in copy, is that the carrier flies from the more accessible, less crowded Midway Airport.
- American Honda Motor Co. (Ketchum Advertising)—"Where is your car parked?" asks a b&w spread with scroll ranking cars by J.D. Power & Associates Customer Satisfaction Index. Honda's Acura is No. 1, with Mercedes-Benz second. Honda, Toyota and Cadillac round out the top five. In all, 15 are shown in the photo.
- Monsieur Henri Wines, Stolichnaya Russian vodka (Calet, Hirsch & Spector)—B&w page with minimal copy features illustration of a Stoli bottle with two warships inside, bearing the U.S. and Soviet flags. Headline is "Here's to smooth sailing." Body copy explains that the countries the next day begin their historic summit at sea. Advertising congratulates "both countries on creating warmer waters."
- Girl Scouts USA (Chiat/Day/-Mojo)—Headline, created from unmatched and askew cut-and-paste letters, is "Sex and drugs and cinnamon roll." Body copy: "Learn how to deal with the first two, and how to bake the third. The Girl Scouts—as great as you want to make it."
- Steinway & Sons (Kelley & Wallwork)—Silhouette of figure at grand piano against white backdrop with the headline: "A Steinway will never sound quite the same again." At the bottom of the ad: "Vladimir Horowitz 1903-1989."

At the awards dinner, Ad Age will also honor the Best Business-to-Business Ad of 1989, as selected by sister publication Business Marketing.

The winning print execution, for Hunter Associates Laboratory (by KSK Communications), shows a photo of a cross-eyed, green-faced little girl staring at a soda with weirdly colored scoops of ice cream. The adjoining copy says such bad color reproduction can be avoided by using Hunter's Printed Image Color Control System.

Tickets to the dinner are $200 per person. For more information, call (312) 649-7794. □

Ad Age 500 grows 9.7%; billings top $85 billion

Dentsu, with gross income of $1.32 billion, remains the world's biggest shop, comfortably ahead of Saatchi

Dentsu Inc. defended its crown as the world's largest advertising agency by pushing its gross income from advertising to $1.32 billion, far outdistancing pesky Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising Worldwide, a unit of Saatchi & Saatchi Co., according to Advertising Age's 46th annual Advertising Agency Income Report.

Growth in both U.S. and international gross income and billings of U.S.-based agencies comprising the Ad Age 500—a barometer of the ad community worldwide—slipped both domestically and abroad to 9.7% in 1989 from 16.9% growth worldwide in '88. Worldwide gross income in 1989 was $12.4 billion on billings of $85.4 billion.

The components of the worldwide gains demonstrate again that growth for the Ad Age 500 remains weighted to activity abroad. U.S. results in '89 advanced 6.8% to $7.3 billion in gross income on $51.5 billion in billings, while international returns for the year grew by 14.2% to $5.3 billion in gross income.

In 1988, the international rate was a formidable 29.9% because of a weaker dollar.

The power of international returns—foreign billings of the Ad Age 500 accounted for 39.6% of the index's worldwide billings—coupled with the frenzied growth in the global ad community influenced the ranking of the world's Top 100 agencies.

This year, agencies qualified for the ranking regardless of their country of origin. In the past, Ad Age's major ranking was worldwide gross income of U.S.-based agencies.

The new ranking (see Page S-6) proves the industry dwells in a global ad village, albeit one heavily influenced by U.S. multinationals.

Of the world's Top 100 agencies, 28 were from the Pacific's western rim, 18 were European and 46 were U.S.-based. Parent agencies were ranked by their consolidated totals; their majority-owned subsidiaries, if accounted for in the parent's totals, were not given a separate ranking.

Dentsu's lead in the world's Top 100 was so commanding the real drama in the worldwide race was who would finish second. Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising, for the first time ever, squeezed past No. 3 Young & Rubicam by recording a 20.2% annual growth, to $890 million in gross income worldwide compared with Y&R's $865.4 million, up 14.2%.

Y&R drew $409.5 million of its gross income from the U.S., a 9.9% increase, to keep its tenuous grip on the No. 1 spot in the U.S., narrowly repelling fast-charging Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising with U.S. gross income of $395.2 million, up 21.1%.

Saatchi's parent, London-based Saatchi & Saatchi Co., tumbled from the top spot among agency holding companies worldwide. Acquisition-loaded WPP Group, also London, unseated Saatchi & Saatchi with $2.4 billion in worldwide gross income, up 18%, on billings of $16.1 billion.

WPP overtook Saatchi on the basis of its acquisition last year of Ogilvy Group. Ogilvy Group ranked No. 5 among the world's mega-groups in 1988 returns with $865 million in gross income.

Saatchi, which had gross income of $2.3 billion, up 15.6%, on billings of $15.8 billion, had led all mega-groups since overtaking Interpublic Group of Cos. in 1986.

Saatchi did, however, draw more of its business from media-related advertising than WPP.

Holding companies are so dominant in the ad business that aside from Dentsu, Y&R and No. 10-ranked Hakuhodo, Tokyo, all the other top 10 positions on the world's Top 100 went to the New York-based multinational agencies of either Saatchi & Saatchi Co., WPP, Interpublic or Omnicom Group. Omnicom is the parent of BBDO Worldwide and DDB Needham Worldwide.

Backer Spielvogel Bates Worldwide, the other agency network under the Saatchi & Saatchi Co. umbrella, finished fourth on the world's Top 100 chart with gross income of $759.8 million, up 10.2%, on billings of $5.1 billion.

McCann-Erickson Worldwide, an Interpublic agency, claimed the No. 5 spot with gross income of $715.5 million, up 8.9%, on billings of $4.8 billion; Ogilvy & Mather Worldwide took No. 6 with $699.7 million gross income, up 10.1%, on billings of $4.8 billion; BBDO Worldwide finished No. 7 with $656.6 million gross income, up 12.1%, on billings of $4.6 billion; WPP's J. Walter Thompson Co. claimed No. 8 with $626.4 million gross income, up 12%, on billings of $4.4 billion; Lintas:Worldwide, another Interpublic shop, finished No. 9 with $593.3 million gross income, up 10.4%.

The Japanese, the most powerful force on the chart apart from the U.S. multinationals, field 22 places and produced a composite gross income of $3.2 billion on billings of $24.6 billion.

The 46 U.S. agencies among the Top 100 turned in an aggregate $10.5 billion in gross income on billings of $70.1 billion. The top 15 U.S. agencies, largely the multinational contingent from the U.S., have their tentacles everywhere. Their international operations accounted for 631 of the 1,006 agencies from 76 countries reporting in the international section of this issue.

Growth, compared with prior years, was relatively modest among Japanese agencies in 1989, even though most came in above 10%.

A slowdown in the Japanese economy and a decline of 3.1% in the yen against the stronger dollar in 1989 were contributing factors. And apart from Dentsu and Hakuhodo, no other Japanese agency finished in the top 20.

The Japanese results came largely from client bases indigenous to Japan. These agencies are poised to expand, however; they are being forced to do so as their multinational clients cover the globe. For example, Hakuhodo, involved in joint ventures with McCann-Erickson Worldwide and Lintas:Worldwide, turned to TBWA Advertising, No. 28 worldwide, to help with the Nissan corporate account in Europe.

Others involved in joint ventures, particularly with U.S. and European agencies, that could evolve into business and new alignments elsewhere include Tokyu Agency International, Tokyo, with No. 15 D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles, New York; Daiko Advertising, Osaka, with No. 12 Foote, Cone & Belding Communications, Chicago, and No. 13 Grey Advertising, New York; Dai-Ichi Kikaku, Tokyo, with Omnicom's Kresser Craig/D.I.K., Rapp Collins Marcoa and No. 11 DDB Needham; No. 45 Orikomi Advertising, Tokyo, with Backer Spielvogel Bates; and even Dentsu, with HDM (in Korea) and Y&R's Burson-Marsteller.

The French, second to none in devising complex agency acquisition schemes, are well represented through No. 16 EWDB Worldwide, No. 17 Publicis-FCB Communications B.V. and No. 20, RSCG Group, Paris.

EWDB is a late 1989 merger of the agencies held by London-based WCRS Group and Paris-based Eurocom, two agency holding companies. The amalgamation is led by its top U.S. shop, Della Femina, McNamee; WCRS Mathews Marcantonio in the U.K.; Belier EWDB in Paris; and Ball Partnership in Australia and Hong Kong.

The two holding companies exchanged stock and created in effect two EWDBs with different ownership structures. The alignment gives Paris indirect voting control amounting to 80% rather than the 60% controlled directly.

Publicis-FCB is what has been termed "an alliance" of the former Foote, Cone & Belding Communications' European shops and Publicis Communications' U.K. and continental shops. The exception is Publicis Conseil which contributes 30% (up from 20% in 1989) to the venture "directly."

Indirectly, however, the Paris shop is bound more tightly into the alliance than its share would indicate. Publicis-FCB in last year's issue had been a merger of Publicis Communications and Foote, Cone & Belding Communications. It was unbundled this year because FCB operates independently outside Europe.

The stronger dollar in 1989 in general reduced the growth rate (in dollars) of non-U.S. agencies. The German mark dropped 6.9% against the dollar, the British pound, 5.5% and French franc, 7.3%.

Despite these fluctuations, the international subsidiaries of agencies in the Ad Age 500 grew an exceptional 14.2% in billings.

Still, that hardly compares to annual growth rates in 1988 and 1987 of 30.6% and 55.9%, respectively, from the same agencies.

U.S. Top 100

While Y&R continued its mastery of the U.S. Top 100 and Saatchi & Saatchi a client shy of passing it, BBDO Worldwide bore down to claim third place with gross income of $373.6 million, up 9.7%, on billings of $2.7 billion.

Three more agencies topped the $300 million range: No. 4 Backer Spielvogel Bates with $310.7 million gross income, up 9.9%, on billings of $2.2 billion; No. 5 Ogilvy & Mather Worldwide with gross income of $305.1 million, up 8.6%, on billings of $2.1 billion; and No. 6 DDB Needham Worldwide with gross income of $302.9 million on billings of $2.4 billion.

DDB Needham made the biggest leap—from No. 9 in 1988—based on a phenomenal 24% year-to-year growth. Four acquisitions, including the San Francisco office of D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles, capped its strong year for account gains.

Because of the new policy of not ranking subsidiaries whose totals already are included in a ranked parent company, the U.S. rankings ran deeper into the ad community than usual.

Chicago's black-owned agency, Burrell Communications Group, secured No. 100 with gross income of $9 million, up 0.5%, on billings of $60.3 million. In previous years, the ticket to the U.S. Top 100 was $11 million in gross income.

Agency brands

Leo Burnett Co., No. 7 in U.S. gross income, built onto its lead as the largest U.S. "brand" agency in recording brand billings of $1.9 billion. An agency "brand" is the core agency minus billings from subsidiaries, specialty units, sales promotion and direct marketing.

Subsidiary tiering over the years has made it hard to define this agency core that still competes for business. J. Walter Thompson Co. replaced Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising as the No. 2 brand, still $159.3 million in billings short of Burnett.

Media kings

The Ad Age 500, represented as the top 500 agencies in the U.S., amassed total spending of $36.6 billion in U.S. media. Network TV claimed 28.8% of the total and was paced by Saatchi & Saatchi with spending of $918.6 million; next was Burnett at $855.1 million.

Saatchi led spot TV as well, with $622.4 million in spending; No. 2 spender was sister agency Backer Spielvogel Bates with $525.2 million.

Saatchi & Saatchi also claimed the consumer magazine title with $422.1 million in spending, far ahead of Y&R at $280.7 million.

DDB Needham finished ahead in newspapers, claiming billings of $240.5 million in the medium. JWT was second at $226.5 million. □

Making equity equitable

HDM and multiple owners are best example of change

HDM Worldwide falls prey to Advertising Age's new method of compiling the world's Top 100 agencies.

HDM is a big agency. Strong in the U.S., it is even more powerful on the international front. HDM's problem is that it does not own itself.

To be ranked among the world's Top 100, an agency must hold at least 50% of its equity that is not held by other agencies on the same list. If it owns less, its billings fall into those of the parent agency based on the percentage the parent holds in the subsidiary. This procedure is to prevent double-dipping whereby a subsidiary claims itself and the parent's consolidated totals do likewise.

HDM has three parents—Eurocom, the French holding company; Dentsu Inc.; and Young & Rubicam. They hold varying equity percentages depending on four global regions: In all, Dentsu walks away with 27% of HDM's worldwide returns, Y&R with 32% and Eurocom, 41%.

Eurocom's cut is larger than the rest because of its weighted share in Europe—HDM's biggest theater of operations where Eurocom takes 51%.

Though missing on the world's Top 100 chart, HDM agencies nonetheless appear in the international country rankings (beginning on Page S-24). HDM also ranks No. 35 on the U.S. Top 100, because Y&R only claims 30% of its U.S. total, leaving 70% of U.S. billings unclaimed by any other agency on the U.S. chart.

Annual review

HDM's international billings grew a dramatic 41.6%, led by its European operations where more than half of its billings emanate. New accounts in Europe included the $15 million EuroDisneyland prelaunch and Sony Corp.'s first pan-European advertising as well as Sara Lee's Douwe Egberts division oral care and detergents in Europe while it lost Beiersdorf AG's Cosmed division in European account consolidation. In the U.S., HDM became the first agency for the Fries Entertainment theatrical distribution account ($5-$10 million), it gained Federal Express international air services ($7-$9 million), Acapulco, Mexico area-hotel group tourism ($10 million), which helped offset the loss of Hewlett-Packard ($13 million). In early 1989 HDM Mattingly, Sydney, was formed as a joint venture between HDM and Mojo-Monohan Dayman Adams Group, a group formed in 1985 that was being dissolved after Mojo merger with Chiat/Day in 1989. In keeping with its plan to expand beyond traditional advertising, HDM Direct Marketing Group was formed in early 1989 as an umbrella company for HDM direct-response shops in Los Angeles, New York, Boston, Paris, Hong Kong and new acquisitions, including Stone & Adler in Chicago. In April, HDM Worldwide opened a Shanghai office, it second in China. Later it signed a non equity affiliate agreement with Hispani marketing agency Castellanos Latina Los Angeles. HDM Korea was opened i December as a joint venture with Oricon Co., Seoul, and was expected to bill $ million in its first year. HDM Worldwid is owned 40.8% by Eurocom, 32.1% b Y&R and 27.1% by Dentsu. Those por tions are included in each parent's re sults.

U.S. Agency of the Year

SF's Goodby, Berlin & Silverstein hailed

Agency's style: freshness, wit, warmth

By Alice Z. Cuneo

Goodby, Berlin & Silverstein, just 7 years old and still, as one of its founders put it, "a David among Goliaths," is Advertising Age's Agency of the Year for 1989.

The first San Francisco agency to win the honor, Goodby beat out runners-up Ammirati & Puris, New York, and Wieden & Kennedy, Portland, Ore. (see Page S-53).

The agency bills $40 million annually, and its work has won high praise. Despite that, it lacks a high-profile national account—its first national commercial, for H.J. Heinz Co.'s Skippy Premium dog food, ran last October.

"They have an excellent creative product," said Hal Riney, chairman of Hal Riney & Partners and spiritual father of Goodby. The agency's principals—Jeff Goodby, 39; Andy Berlin, 40; and Rich Silverstein, 40—all worked for Mr. Riney at Ogilvy & Mather in San Francisco before forming their own shop.

Goodby claims not to have an agency "style." Its work is consistent only in its unexpected freshness, typically accomplished with wit and warmth.

To boost awareness of the University of California at San Francisco—and overcome neighborhood opposition to expansion plans—the agency dressed a real-life expert on parasitic diseases, the university's C.C. Wang, in hockey goalie gear and showed him flailing futilely at puck after puck.

As the shellshocked scientist crawls off the ice, voice-over says the university might be better-known if it had good sports teams, and the tagline flashes on the screen: "125 years and still no sports."

Commercials for Supercuts, a hair salon chain, never mention stylish hair but powerfully suggest the romantic possibilities it affords.

In one spot, a young man at a wedding reception is unable to hide his surprise—and delight—at a buddy's suddenly grown-up kid sister.

Noticing his interest, she tosses her magnificent long hair back and gives him a knowing look. "Supercuts" shows briefly on the screen.

Goodby's b&w commercials for the San Francisco Examiner were probably the first to signal the agency was bringing something new to the party.

One execution in the long-running campaign depicts "Wild Will Hearst," the newspaper's publisher, recklessly driving an Examiner delivery truck over the hills of the city.

The suspense builds, Hitchcocklike, as the commercial cuts between speeding truck and a little old lady who's dropped a quarter precisely in its path and is bending to pick it up.

The truck arrives, swooshing right at her. In the next frames, she's holding an Examiner as Mr. Hearst smugly flips the quarter in his hand.

Goodby's most elegant work has been for the upscale Royal Viking Cruise Line. For the campaign's print ads, Mr. Silverstein paged through old typography books until he found a typeface that would evoke what he called "the art of cruising in the '40s."

"It isn't just pretty," he said. "It enhances the product."

Much of the agency's print work exhibits an unusual sensitivity to type, most notably in ads for the Australian Lamb Council and the Nature Co.

In a recent roundtable discussion on agencies' use of computers (AA, March 12), Mr. Silverstein said: "I don't want to be limited to what typefaces are on a machine. I have a great reverence for type."

For a campaign for Polaroid Corp.'s Cool Cam, an instant camera for teen-agers, Goodby shot impromptu teen endorsements of the camera.

One of the spots, of a young man wearing a battered pair of glasses and delivering his Southern-accented pitch as the camera tries in vain to keep him in frame, is now on the Goodby reel.

"We like to be spontaneous with the work—to get at things before people overthink them, to get at their initial, instinctive emotions," Mr. Goodby said. "That's why we use a lot of raw footage and a lot of humor."

The Goodby principals decided to create an agency—"an environ-

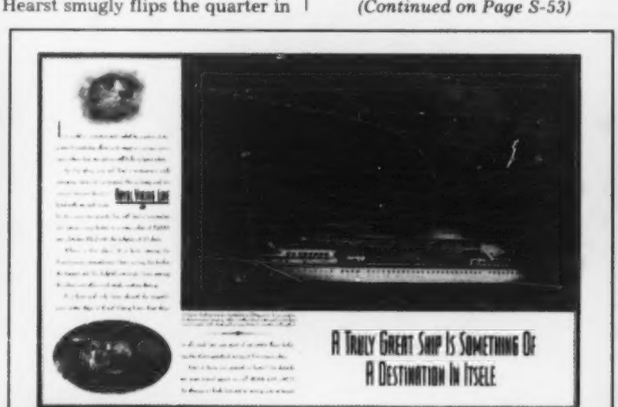
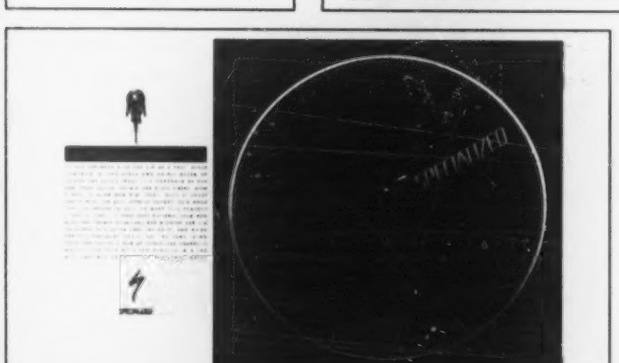
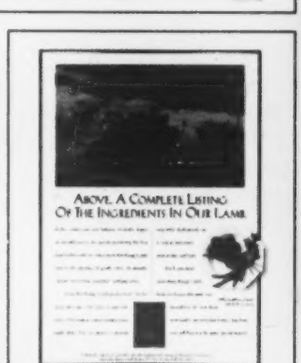
A wedding, an airport, a school and a kitchen are settings for soft-sell SuperCuts spots.

Toby, the neighborhood canine Lothario, stars in a humorous "get your dog fixed" SPCA message.







Goodby, Berlin & Silverstein's print ads include a wide variety of executions and illustrate Creative Director Rich Silverstein's use of an array of different typefaces to enhance the mood of the ads.

Stains on an upstairs rug may be his but the pet still deserves Skippy Premium, this spot says.

International Agency of the Year

Contrapunto engineers locomotion to top spot

Surprises tell Spanish success story

By Marina Specht

Storytelling abilities and surprise endings are some of the creative techniques that earned for Spain's Contrapunto the title of Advertising Age International Agency of the Year for 1989.

After two straight years as a runner-up, the Madrid-based shop was selected from 51 agencies in 19 countries.

A prime example of the Spanish agency's ability to capture a TV viewer's attention with a well-told tale is a commercial for the Spanish state railway, RENFE.

The commercial opens with a well-dressed business executive riding on a train. His work is interrupted, however, when a boy with an Indian headdress suddenly appears from behind the seat and pretends to shoot an imaginary arrow at the businessman, who playacts as a cowboy.

The man plays dead until the conductor wants his ticket.

It's only after almost 45 seconds that TV viewers realize they're seeing a commercial for the railway.

The agency's ads often make use of simple plots, superb photography and strong, straightforward copy.

These techniques are used for products and services as diverse as shoe polish from Reckitt & Colman, a hair-removing device from Protecno's Epilady and government social programs.

"Our only philosophy is to surprise [the viewer], always," said Juan Mariano Mancebo, 38, who shares the post of chief creative director at Contrapunto with Jose Maria Lapena, 37.

Contrapunto's ability to surprise viewers gained international attention last year with a campaign for the state-owned TV network TVE intended to urge Spaniards not to watch too much TV. The 2-year-old campaign won the Grand Prix at the 1989 International Advertising Film Festival in Cannes.

The protagonist of two heart-tugging spots is a dog named Pippin, who unsuccessfully tries to convince his young master to leave the TV and play. The pup runs away from home, clutching his suitcase, in one of the commercials.

"When the campaign ended, thousands of people called the TVE headquarters to find out what happened to the dog," said Teo Marcos, 47, president and cofounder of the 15-year-old agency, a BBDO Worldwide affiliate.

The agency responded to the outcry with a third spot that evoked the same emotions and reinforced the shop's reputation for creativity.

In "Christmas Card," Pippin hangs out in a bar after closing time on Christmas Eve. Sitting on a stool, next to his suitcase, the dog sadly rejects delicious pastries and responds only when the bartender sits down at the piano. The two play "Silent Night" together in the empty bar.

"The ads [were] so popular that a lot of Spanish companies started using the dog's name and image to sell anything from clay figures and toys to T-shirts," Mr. Mancebo said.

The future of the Pippin saga depends on whether Contrapunto keeps the account, now undergoing its annual review.

If the account leaves, it wouldn't be the first time Contrapunto lost advertising business despite high-quality creative work.

On Jan. 1, Contrapunto lost a major piece of business when U.K.-based Reckitt & Colman decided to realign most of its business worldwide with Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising, Young & Rubicam and BDDP Group. Contrapunto lost $3.8 million in Reckitt business.

"Leaving Contrapunto was a pity; they knew our brands well, and they understood the spirit of our company," said Manuel Suarez, Reckitt marketing director in Spain.

One of the agency's last pieces of work for the household products marketer was a TV spot for Nugget shoe polish.

As classical music plays, various colors of creamy shoe polish are spread on a canvas. The end result is a beautiful abstract

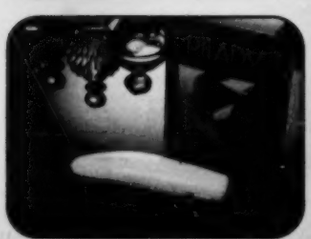
A game of Cowboys and Indians offers viewers a first-class ride to the Wild West aboard this 45-second TV spot for state-run railroad RENFE.

Love rides the rails in these ads, themed the "Tale of the train." On the left, gloves, a photo and a lock of hair keep the romantic encounter fresh, while on the right, a photo and flowers tug at the heartstrings.

"Off with her head" is the battle cry for this clever El Pais newspaper ad with mail-in coupon.

Simplicity quickly offers a memorable print ad, themed "For the fast way," for state-run railroad RENFE.

A grandma on the go is featured in this TV spot for the National Institute for Social Affairs.



The point of this ad for Protecno's Epilady isn't fuzzy as the fruit remains intact.

Leo Burnett Co. has held on to its U.S. "brand" billings lead for the second consecutive year, strongly ahead of new second-place agency, J. Walter Thompson.

Burnett, holding one of the top two spots during all six years of Advertising Age's brand competition, extended its lead to $159.3 million, well above its $24.9 million first-place margin last year over Saatchi & Saatchi, whose prior year totals are skewed because of new "brand" computing methodology.

The Ad Age "brand" chart ranks agencies by pure advertising billings. As listed, these agencies are stripped of subsidiaries that have their own identity and/or deal in specialties such as direct response, PR, research, pharmaceutical, sales promotion or Yellow Pages. In the past, billings from these specialties have been included in U.S. "brand" totals when such business was not claimed by an autonomous unit. This year, agencies were stripped of all non-pure advertising billings, such as direct response, despite the source of those billings.

However, some agencies do not include all subsidiaries in their U.S. totals. Exclusions in the accompanying chart list only units whose billings were absorbed in their reported U.S. totals.

Under this criteria, the brand often is the reduction of the agency to a single name in multiple cities handling only advertising. This process allows subsidiaries to stand on their own and parent agencies to be more fairly compared.

The specialty units or subsidiaries were eliminated from the parent based on figures reported either by the subsidiary or parent for these operations. When billings totals could not be obtained from the shops, they were estimated by Ad Age. Prior-year figures have been adjusted to reflect the agency composition in 1989.

In this era of megamergers, reduction to brands provides advertisers with a better understanding of the agencies' family trees as they continue to branch out. The brand agency concept is controversial among the multi-layered agencies, of course, because they are seeking to become "seamless," though separate identities are maintained in the case of some subsidiaries.

In terms of consolidated U.S. billings, Young & Rubicam continues to rank No. 1 on the Ad Age chart, but it slumped to No. 6 among the brands. Without its subsidiaries, Y&R's total U.S. billings were more than cut in half.

Among the Top 10 brands, Grey claimed the best percentage gain of 30.1%, and D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles, the second best at 19.3%. DMB&B in fact leaped from No. 9 to No. 4.

The largest decline hit Lord Geller Federico & Einstein, New York, which fell off the chart from No. 47 last year after experiencing a 65.6% drop in billings. LGFE in 1989 continued to be plagued by executive defections and loss of the IBM account in 1988. Doremus & Co. is the only other agency to lose its place among the Top 50 brand agencies, falling from No. 46 to No. 54 as its billings dropped 18.2%.

Notes: Dollars are in thousands. NR indicates agency not ranked. Initials in parentheses indicate the parent company in which the subsidiaries' figures are included. See methodology below. See Page S-58 for an alphabetical index. ✓ indicates that the agency received signature of an independent accountant verifying figures supplied to AA. * indicates that gross income and/or total volume figures are AA estimates.

Methodology to domestic & international rankings

Some of the material in this issue represents a shift in how Advertising Age ranks the global community of ad agencies.

The "world's Top 100 agencies by gross income" chart (Page S-6) reflects the international marketing community's growing activity in Europe and the Pacific Rim. Of the Top 100 agencies worldwide, 28 are Pacific Rim, 18 are European and 46 U.S.

Prior to this year's report, which ranks agencies regardless of country of origin, the primary ranking was U.S.-based agencies by worldwide gross income. Since only 38 U.S. agencies have international billings, and most are among the world's Top 100, AA prepared another table that ranked all U.S. agencies only by domestic gross income (Page S-14). This ranking parallels the listing of more than 1,000 foreign agencies from 76 countries ranked within their respective countries (Page S-24).

Ad Age eliminated what is referred to as "double-dipping" by U.S. subsidiary agencies. This practice permitted both a parent agency and its subsidiary to be ranked on the same chart, the parent claiming the subsidiary and its own income figure, and the subsidiary, separating its figures from the parent's and claiming itself.

Double-dipping tended to add confusion since it began in the early '80s with the rapid consolidation of agencies. Last year, 26 agencies in the Top 100 U.S. agencies chart based on worldwide gross income were double-dipped, thereby denying 26 other agencies a higher ranking and entry to this elite chart.

To avoid eliminating listings of consolidated subsidiaries, AA is showing its results in the chart "U.S.-based agencies by domestic gross income" (Page S-14). Here the subsidiary is placed in the ranked spot it would have occupied had it not been included in its parent's total, but it receives no ranking (NR).

Nevertheless, a few double-dippers remain. Agencies qualify for ranking if they hold at least 50% of their equity. Their ranking is based on 100% of their returns. A parent agency is allowed to claim its ownership percentage of a unit's gross income and billings. Hence, some of the returns of a ranked agency show up in those of the ranked parent. A parent's equity in a subsidiary is defined as MJ for majority, MN for minority, NE for non-equity, JV for joint venture, NA for not applicable and ND for not declared. Not all subsidiaries are double-dipped. For example, Levine, Huntley, Schmidt & Beaver is a subsidiary of Grey Advertising but is not included in Grey's totals. Non-U.S. results of unranked subsidiaries appearing on the U.S. domestic gross income chart do not show up. Those results can be found in the footnotes to the chart, "U.S. agencies with foreign billings" (Page S-32).

Billed media rankings

Ranking by media category (Page S-56) is based on the parent's consolidated total. Where the parent's total for a given medium includes a subsidiary's contribution of 50% or more, that unit is noted.

Questionnaire: Gross income, volume

Data, including gross income and volume, were obtained by questionnaire.

Gross income in the traditional agency structure is the sum of media commissions earned from media billings, the markup (usually 17.65%) for materials and services billed the client and the raw fee. Some agencies may provide only billings or miscalculated gross income, requiring Ad Age to estimate gross income.

Volume is the sum of media billings, billings to the client for materials and services and capitalized fees—a method of equating fees to billings by treating the raw fee as if it were a 15% media commission. When agencies did not break out their U.S. billings by office, those numbers were estimated and the agency was contacted for comment.

This year marks the sixth year in which agencies provided verification from an independent accountant for figures they reported. Such verification does not require an audit. Those agencies providing a signature were noted by a check mark accompanying their entry on the chart ranking U.S. agencies by gross income.

Exchange rates

Agencies converted local currency to dollars using average annual exchange rates provided by AA and shown at the beginning of each country's ranking beginning on Page S-24. A different rate is provided for the two comparable years (1989 and 1988), providing an historic reading of the prior year. AA adjusted rates for inflation-plagued Brazil and Argentina after questionnaires were returned. □

Annual review

Higher interest rates and a sluggish U.K. stock market have temporarily gridlocked a stock buyback deal in which AMV would unite with Scali, McCabe, Sloves (which owns 23% of AMV) to create a holding company whose shares would be used to reduce WPP Group's ownership in Scali from 80% to 20%. AMV's billings slowed to a 9.4% increase in 1989 after a strong 35% push in 1988. This agency owns 76% each of Leagas Delaney Ltd. and Lippa Newton Ltd. in London, along with 100% of a sales promotion subsidiary, McBain Noel Johnson.

Growth of 15% is expected in billings in 1990 as the agency produces a full-year of work for new accounts gained during 1989—including Ortho Mattress ($8-10 million), Public Storage ($10 million), and Sav-On/Osco. Such gains helped push billings up 12.2% in 1989, and produce $37.5 million in new billings. Existing accounts provided $19 million in billing's growth, while departing accounts including Circuit City Stores ($15 million) took away $29 million in billings.

The agency, which grew only 1.4% in billings in pounds in 1989, served as a fulcrum for its parent, Lopex Group PLC, to create a single advertising identity in the UK. The agency got its new name when Lopex acquired Rex Stewart Group UK and merged Stewart's Wethey Scott Pocock agency into ASL Alliance/-Alliance UK to form Alliance International UK, which also got Lopex's financial ad unit, St. James Communications. The Alliance moniker now applies to 20 ad agencies worldwide that comprise the agency holding company, Alliance International. That company itself is controlled by Lopex PLC, London.

Annual review

Billings are expected to expand from the 7% growth in 1989 to a projected 10% to 15% in 1990 stemming from the full impact of the newly acquired $25 million Shearson Lehman Hutton account, the consolidating of Tambrands business at A&G (it gained the $15 million Tampax brand) and $12 million in new products from Weight Watchers. Lorillard, Jergens and Pfizer also added to the $15 million billings increase from existing business, offsetting $20 million in lost business. In December, 1988, MCA sold 50% of this agency, and operating control, to Wesray Capital Corp. for $30 million, resulting in a reshuffling of personnel. In May, Bill Bishop resigned as president to chair a small healthcare agency. Warren Dechter was promoted to president-ceo from exec vp-client svcs, and relinquished the ceo title to William N. Luceno when he was hired from Welis, Rich, Greene where he had been president. Nancy Vaughan was named exec vp-group creative director to strengthen A&G's ability to address the women's market. The agency's focus shifted to packaged goods.

International Inseparable Agency, headquartered in New York, answered a questionnaire received from Ad Age in late December. But if the editors had not heard from IIA by January, a second form was sent. If IIA still had not responded and had gross income greater than $16.0 million in the prior year, the agency was contacted for a response.

Income: IIA and other agencies are ranked by worldwide gross income, which gives a better indication of size than volume (billings). Gross income is generally the sum of three sources: A percentage markup (15% or less) from media buys; a 17.65% markup for materials and services billed to the client; and the fee charged to the client.

Volume: Volume (short for capitalized billings) is the sum of three types of agency activity: Total commissionable billings for ad space and time; gross billings to clients for materials like artwork, research, etc., when supplied or performed by organizations other than the agency; and capitalized fees. Fees are capitalized by multiplying fees by 6.67. This makes fee income equivalent to billings by treating the fee as if it were a media commission. The 6.67 multiplier is the quotient of 100 divided by 15 (the media commission).

Workforce & facilities: This is IIA's total number of employees and offices worldwide, including all subsidiaries.

U.S. office billings in 1989: IIA broke out billings for each major U.S. office, or these billings were estimated by Ad Age and the agency was called for comment. Subsidiary offices are included if the subsidiary's billings are included in the parent's total. Service offices are not included.

Non-U.S. office billings in 1989: Non-U.S. billings and gross income were obtained by questionnaire. Throughout this report, agency affiliations with large multinational agency networks are noted by the following symbols:

(MAJ) majority ownership by the multinational
(MIN) minority ownership by the multinational
(MO) equity ownership not disclosed
(NA) equity not available
(NE) a non-equity affiliation
(JV) a 50%/50% joint venture

printing and publishing operations, and major new accounts won by the main agency in 1989 should effect a billings growth of 25% in 1990. The agency, whose staff increased by 38%, has recorded at least 30% growth in billings each of its past three fiscal reporting periods. Management at ARC recently bought back the agency from Grey Advertising.

■ Annual review

Asatsu, posting a 13.1% growth in billings in 1989, expects a similar gain in 1990 based on continued worldwide expansion and a favorable economic climate for advertising due in part to the Japanese government's emphasis on local business growth. A Frankfurt, Germany, office was founded in 1989; the agency bought CAM Associates Pte. in Singapore and acquired major equity in Thai Image, Thailand.

■ Annual review

Ayer, which moved to new headquarters in New York's Worldwide Plaza, could not stem the tide of account losses which rolled over the agency in 1989. The $150-$200 million Burger King business was the biggest national defection. New York execs were sent in to shore up the Chicago office which lost key accounts—regional Burger King business ($25 million), Illinois Bell ($15 million), Deere & Co. ($8-$10 million), Citicorp Savings of Illinois ($5 million) and Outboard Marine Corp., which pulled back on consumer advertising and consolidated trade advertising elsewhere. The Chicago office then was merged with Zwiren, Collins, Karo, Trusk, a local shop which Ayer bought in late 1989. Other losses included Sterling Drug's Neo-Synephrine ($3.7 million), although the agency retained Sterling's Phillip's Milk of Magnesia, Haley's M-O and Phisoderm. The Avon Products account also went in-house. In early 1990 its Houston office lost the Continental Airlines account ($45-$50 million). These losses were somewhat offset by $145 million account gains in pan-European billings from Gillette, Beiersdorf AG's Cosmed division and SEAT, the Spanish division of VW, as well as Procter & Gamble's domestic consolidation of Folgers coffee account ($45 million) at Ayer. Midyear, the agency acquired 40% of Canada's Spectrum Group which owns McKim Advertising, Toronto, an estimated $150 million shop. Earlier, it pulled out of Australia by selling back its 49% equity in Connaghan & May. Ayer but continued as an international associate. In December it agreed to acquire 100% ownership of Ayer Barker, its London-based affiliate, in exchange for Ayer's 12.7% stake in parent Charles Barker PLC. Also, it formed a joint venture with World International Network, a TV production company, to develop, produce and distribute programming via "member" broadcast channels reaching 106 countries. In early 1990, the pr unit was reorganized and renamed Wayland Associates after agency founder F. Wayland Ayer. Louis T. Hagopian, 29-year-agency veteran, retired as chairman and was succeeded by Jerry J. Siano. Thomas Maxey, president-international, was named vice chairman responsible for all worldwide offices except New York and Detroit. Charles Decker, former president of Mediatech-East, was named director of worldwide business development, a new post.

■ Annual review

Worldwide billings were up 9.9%, as domestic and overseas businesses shared equally in the growth. In the U.S., $61 million in billings came both from new clients, including J.P. Morgan ($9 million) and Jhirmack ($14 million), and from existing accounts, including new products from Burroughs-Wellcome, Carter Wallace, North American Philips and Xerox. The agency retained CBS' media planning and buying account but lost the CBS entertainment division ($6 million). It suffered one of its biggest losses early this year when Prudential Insurance ($60 million) left after 20 years—a decline likely to cause some layoffs in the New York office. International expansion included the consolidation of the Fisher-Price pan-European account ($9.6 million) at BSB with Dorland as lead office. In early 1990 BSB bought four agencies in Norway and Sweden from Scan Partner. BSB Europe reached a deal in June, 1989, with Goskino, the Soviet state committee for cinematography, to train Soviets in developing TV commercials. During the year, Chairman-CEO Robert Holmen retired, William Backer became president-worldwide creative director, Robert H. Lenz became chairman-exec creative dir and Constantine "Dean" Scaros, president-managing director.

■ Annual review

Baker Lovick expects billings to grow about 8.5% in 1990, with the increase coming largely from Western Canada covered by its offices in Vancouver, Calgary, Edmonton and a Victoria office to start up this year. Returns in 1989 included those of Grant Tandy Ltd., which merged with BL in June 1989. In the merger, Grant Tandy's core accounts John Deere, Dun & Bradstreet and Merrell Dow Pharmaceuticals came on board. GT's Arby account ($700,000) was resigned due to conflict. Under the new ownership structure, Baker Lovick is owned 100% by Comcore/BBDO Inc., while Omnicom Group's BBDO Worldwide retains 49% equity of Baker Lovick.

■ Annual review

Worldwide expansion remained a priority at BBDO which named a new European board of directors in January 1989, to prepare for 1992. By November, a joint venture in the Soviet Union was being planned with West German publishing giant Burda and Soviet government agency Vneshtorgizdat. In between, BBDO bought a minority stake in Jenssen & Borkenhagen, Oslo; bought Gallardo Cordoba & Associates, San Juan, Puerto Rico, increased its minority equity in Stentor/BBDO, Taipei, to a majority; and signed non-equity affiliation agreements with shops in Ireland (Dublin) and Pakistan. Major account gains at BBDO-named shops included Hellmann's and Best Foods mayonnaise brands ($20 million), additional business from Sara Lee Corp.'s European coffee and groceries unit ($30 million) and Federal Express international ($20 million). These gains outweighed losses of Lorillard's Kent brand ($10 million), Lever Bros.' Wisk ($13 million) and Alamo Rent A Car ($5 million) to help BBDO post consolidated billings growth of 12.3%. Norman Campbell retired as chairman-ceo of BBDO Worldwide and was succeeded by Allen Rosenshine. Separately, Arthur Sturgess was named to new post of president at BBDO Asia-Pacific, while Willi Schalk resigned as president-ceo BBDO Worldwide and Carl Casselman took the new post of senior vp-senior creative director in New York. Carmichael-Lynch in Minneapolis bought subsidiary Doremus & Co.'s Kansas City office, and subsidiary Tracy-Locke's LA office suffered the loss of the $75 million Taco Bell account. T-L's Phil Slott, chairman-chief creative officer, retired.

Weaving tangled webs

Lopex PLC is a "double" holding company through its majority ownership of another holding company, Alliance International, that manages a network of 20 advertising agencies. Buoyed by mergers and strong European markets—the source of most of its business—Alliance increased billings by 25.2% to $835 million. Of the 20 agencies in Alliance, only four are less than 50% owned by the network. In the ownership structure of Alliance, 17 agencies own one share (one per country), while Lopex owns one share per country, plus one. Directors of Alliance are the CEO's of each agency (one for each country). Aside from advertising, Lopex drew $505 million, up 30%, from its "communication" side that includes M.E.A.L., the U.K.'s media-monitoring

Annual review

Billings increased 14.2% in 1989 as a new-business drive succeeded in pulling in eight new accounts. Two were Europewide (Polaroid film and Reckitt & Colman toiletries) and another was worldwide—TAG-Heuer (luxury sport watches). BDDP Paris is the lead agency of BDDP Group, a holding company which had $118.6 million in gross income and $791 million in billings in 1989. The agency received three Gold Lions for ads at the Cannes International Advertising Film Festival last year. Eric Tong Cuong replaced Jacques Levy as head of the Paris shop.

Accounts

Gained: France Loto (national lottery), Korean Air, Matra Telecommunications, Mc Cain (frozen food), Pier Import (furniture), Polaroid (conventional film and instant-Europe), Reckitt & Colman (toiletries-Europe), TAG-Heuer (luxury sport watches—worldwide).

Annual review

Bloom spent 1989 rebounding from its unsuccessful pitch for the $100 million Nissan Infiniti account, on which it finished second after resigning the $10 million Alfa Romeo account to gain the final round. It reported a drop of $14.4 million in billings that also included the departure of Sterling Optical ($5 million) and Pinkerton Tobacco, which consolidated its account at Buntin Advertising. The agency won and then lost the $4 million Grandy's Restaurants account. Gains included Deposit Guaranty Bank ($5 million) and New Zealand Marketing Development Board ($2 million). Bloom Public Relations, not included in the parent's total results, reported $9.4 million in billings, up 40.3%. In November, C. Anthony "Tony" Wainwright, president-coo, resigned after nine years and Robert Bloom assumed his titles and management responsibilities.

U.S. accounts

Annual review

Of the $128 million increase in billings, the U.S. claimed 75% of the growth because of major new business gains from new accounts, Long John Silver's ($30 million) and Pfizer ($25 million). International growth was credited to new account gains from Samsung, Holiday Inns and Rockwell International, a boost in its London equity investment from 20% to 40%, and the opening of new shops in Portugal and Taiwan in which it took 75% and 45% positions, respectively. Bozell is part of the Bozell, Jacobs, Kenyon & Eckhardt holding company. A 9%-10% growth is anticipated in 1990 based on anticipated account gains and continued increases from existing accounts. Forecasting more international investments and continued top management involvement in all operations, the agency made several personnel changes including promoting David Bell to president and making Birmingham, Mich., his principal office, close to Chrysler Corp. account. In early 1990, European operations were restructured with Roger Neill becoming chief executive of Bozell Europe and Winston Fletcher, chairman.

Annual Review

A New York office, opened in March, and the January acquisition of Ensslin & Hall, Tampa, brought $18 million of the total $38.1 million in billings gained from new business. Major new accounts included Donnelley Directory-Mid Atlantic Yellow Pages ($10 million), TropWorld Casino & Entertainment Resort ($10 million) and CoreStates Bank ($8 million). Existing business added a slim $1.3 million, mostly from USAir due to its acquisition of Piedmont. Lost accounts totaled $16.7 million and included Freddie Mac ($3 million), Alt Robins Pharmaceuticals ($3 million) and LifeTouch Studios ($2 million). An $800,000 lawsuit filed by former owners of the Atlanta office, acquired in 1987, was settled out of court and EPB bought another Atlanta agency, Noble Liller Neal, to specialize in food advertising. A Miami office, reporting to Tampa, opened in October. Billings growth of 14.5% in 1989 will fall back to about 5% in 1990, according to the agency, citing the paring back of spending from some accounts and the loss this February of the $15-to-$20 million Roy Rogers account, which left when the restaurant was bought by Hardee's Food Systems.

Annual review

Growth of 13.3% in worldwide billings gave Burnett its fifth year in a row of double-digit growth as it topped the $3 billion mark in 1989. Growth was attributed largely to additional assignments from existing clients. Hallmark awarded its $35-$40 million account to Burnett last year and Pillsbury consolidated its estimated $4.8 million line of bakery sweet goods account at Burnett as part of a strategy to bring Pillsbury Brands and Green Giant division under one agency. Noxell assigned its $7.9 million Noxzema Skin Care products line after previously awarding its shaving cream brand. Other big gains included $8.7 million Gordon's gin and $7.1 million White Horse scotch whiskey (to Burnett-Kyodo). Heaviest losses included the estimated $30 million Mars account in December (which it had just won the previous summer) and $25-$30 million 7 UP international account (when Pepsi-Cola consolidated worldwide advertising at BBDO). In July, three Procter & Gamble shops including Burnett discussed joint media-buying in Europe. Near yearend, the $70 million Madrid agency, Vitruvio, merged with Burnett. Burnett headquarters settled into a new 50-story office building in Chicago.

Billings slowed to a 3.6% growth at this Alliance network agency which charted a 7.8% increase in the prior year. The agency is 30% owned by Lopex PLC through its ownership of the Alliance network (also a holding company). In addition to the main Paris office of CFP, returns also include subsidiary shops: Rotation (sales promo), J. Larue (direct marketing), Consensus (recruitment) and Corolle (pr). Samsung Corp.-owned Cheil Communications, the leading South Korean agency in total billings, changed its name from Korea First Advertising in 1989, affiliated with Bozell Inc., New York, early in the year, and at yearend opened a joint venture in South Korea with Bozell called Cheil Bozell. Through this relationship, Bozell gained $20 million in worldwide Samsung business. In September, Cheil opened three liaison offices in New York, San Jose and London. Cheil expects a 14% increase in billings for 1990, a smaller percentage than its average growth since 1985 due to limited availability of space on Korea's TV CF and the recession in South Korea.

Annual review

The billings mix got an infusion of $67.5 million from new accounts while existing accounts (almost exclusively Nissan) yielded growth of $129.1 million in billings to far outpace $15 million in lost business. This produced a domestic gain of 30.1% in billings. New accounts included Bissell Inc. ($15 million potential), American Express Gold Card ($25 million), New York Life Insurance ($30 million) and Eveready-Energizer ($25 million). Cutbacks from existing clients Drexel Burnham Lambert and Golden Grain added to the billings mix. During the year Reebok added its $15 million international account to the London office, but then in early 1990 put C/D/M's $40 million U.S. portion up for review. C/D/M initially resigned from the account but now may be back in the running. The agency, in folding newly acquired Mojo Advertising of Australia into its operations, merged Mojo's two U.S. offices in New York and San Francisco into C/D's shops there, eliminating 26% of Mojo USA/SF staffers. C/D/M plans to target European business, headed by the expanding London office (opened by Mojo in 1987), and to acquire a European-based agency in early 1990. In Australia, the Sydney office, which gained the $15 million Toyota account, dominates billings returns from the agency's five shops in Australia/New Zealand. Singapore, a branch office, remained the lone Asian shop after the Hong Kong agency was closed in 1989. Bob Wolf was named to chairman-ceo of North America so Jay Chiat, as chairman-ceo worldwide, can tend to international expansion. Tom McElligott moved in at yearend as exec vp-executive creative director, replacing Bill Hamilton, who left for O&M. The agency budgets billings growth for 1990 at 16%, but does not include projected billings from new business, which historically has affected overall annual growth of 30%.

Billings, which grew 12.2% in yen in 1989, are expected to drop to a 10% increase in 1990. Business expansion of existing clients will provide most of the growth, says the agency. During 1989 the agency sold the remaining shares in its Malaysian agency, Chuo Senko (M) Sdn Bhd. The agency has three remaining subsidiaries outside Japan—Thailand (49% equity), Singapore (66%) and Hong Kong (100%)—and has seven Japanese branch offices aside from its headquarters in Tokyo.

Heavy spending by Toyota ($13 million) and from the generic sugar account ($13 million) added to CDP's assignments, and the government's Water Privatisation Campaign ($38 million) helped elevate billings by a dramatic 24.7% in 1989. The agency set up an international media department, added four new countries to its network and opened offices in Lisbon, Barcelona and Milan. Billings are projected to increase 33% this year, three-quarters of that increase from organic growth and the remainder from new European partners. CDP subsidiary agencies and their percentage ownership are: Alice, France (50%), Canard, Italy (60%), Grupo Barro, Spain/Portugal (60%), RPM/Radar, Turkey (30%). CDP London also includes Travis Dale and CDP Financial.

Dai-Ichi Kikaku this year expects its billings growth of 7.7% in 1989 to accelerate to near the 15% level. Europe is responsible for the higher expectations. The agency early this year sent staff to London and Duesseldorf in anticipation of establishing a European office. Dai-Ichi Kikaku billings include minor investments in Kresser, Craig/DIK of 33% and shops with U.S. agency associations: DIK Rapp & Collins Direct Marketing (66.8%), and DDB Needham DIK (Japan, Hong Kong, Singapore and Malaysia). It also owns 2% of I&S, another Top 100 agency. The agency also has investments in two U.S. agency holding companies—Omnicom and Mickelberry.

■ Annual review

The agency anticipates growth in 1990 to parallel 1989 results which grew 13.2% based on a net increase of $442.3 million in billings. The big growth in the billings mix came from new account wins, up $537.2 million, while existing clients increased their spending by $139.9 million. Some $234.8 million in accounts left the agency. Growth in 1989 was aided by acquisitions of U.S. operations, Penchina Selkowitz Inc., Connecticut Consulting Group and Ives & Associates, and Holko-Somerset in Australia. It formed 1675 Productions, an in-house production company, and in early 1990 created a publicity unit under its entertainment group. It bought a 49% stake in Sosa & Associates, San Antonio, which was awarded the Spanish-language ad and promotion portion of the $90 million Burger King account that D'Arcy won in 1989. In Europe, its U.K.-based, wholly-owned IMP unit launched in October IMP Europe, a network of 19 wholly-owned promotion companies. Result Management in the Netherlands also bought back 85% of its shares held by D'Arcy. Major new account wins included Maxwell House coffee ($50 million) and Gordon's Gin in Europe ($15-$20 million). In April, Kraft General Foods Group consolidated at D'Arcy network and cable TV buying ($300-$325 million). Due to major account losses on the West Coast, including Sun Diamond Growers of California ($12 million for Sun-Maid raisins and Sunsweet prunes), DMB&B sold its San Francisco office to DDB Needham Worldwidein February. In personnel changes, president Roy Bostock was named chief executive officer succeeding John S. Bowen who remained chairman while John Nieman was named U.S. executive creative director, the first such title in the agency's history. In April, John Ferries was named new president of the international division, succeeding Peter Redsell who retired.

■ Annual review

As one of the two leading agency networks of Omnicom Group, DDB Needham had a busy year of global acquisitions, affiliations and joint ventures including Korea (Daehong Advertising, Seoul), Greece (Olympic, Athens), Scandinavia (Carlsson & Broman, Stockholm; Avanti, Oslo and Nielsen Mikkelsen & Duus, Copenhagen), Germany (Wensauer & Partners, Stuttgart; Heye & Partner, Munich), France (Providence, Paris), and Austria (Heye & Partner, Vienna). All this is in keeping with the DDB trend of having non-U.S. affiliates account for almost half of total gross income and a third of overall profits. Major new business gains included Conforama Hypermarket ($50 million), Paris; various General Mills ($20 million) business, Philips Telecommunications & Information ($10 million), Amsterdam; ConAgra Country Pride chicken ($10 million); and the Henkel fa body and bath products ($5 million) for 25 countries. These offset losses: Energizer ($25 million), 1st Nationwide Financial Corp. ($15-$20 million), Johnson & Johnson Carefree line in 11 European markets ($15 million) and Clorox ($20 million in early 1990). During 1989 DDB assembled a pan-European marketing network of pr, corporate and financial communications, direct marketing and sales promotion agencies and at yearend was preparing to enter Eastern Europe with a joint venture in Hungary. In the U.S. it bought D'Arcy's San Francisco office as well as Jack Wodell Associates, a San Francisco agency with a roster of leading motion picture clients, and combined its general and retail agencies in San Francisco. Also it acquired Deulofeau-Wilson, a Culver City, Calif., retail agency, and Elgin Syferd, a Seattle agency. In addition, DDB established Premier Productions, an in-house commercial production unit in New York similar to Zone One Productions unit in its Chicago office. Personnel changes included installation of Bernard Brochand, former Eurocom chief executive, as president of DDB Needham International, Paris-based operation of DDB Needham Worldwide network, succeeding John Bradstock who became New York-based corporate exec vp-global accounts. Alan Pilkington, president of DDB Needham's Asia-Pacific region, added the job of director of corporate planning, and Joe Daly retired as chairman of DDB executive committee.

■ Annual review

Multifaceted Dentsu retained its position as the world's largest advertising agency as it continued to expand from its Japanese base, establishing in January, 1989, Dentsu Spain, and forming joint ventures, DBM Toyko and DBM America, with Burson-Marsteller. Dentsu also acquired Fortune Communication Holdings Ltd. (FCH) in Australia, and renamed the company Dentsu Australia Pty. Ltd. In July HDM, a company in which Dentsu owns 27%, acquired a share of Mattingly in Australia and also set up HDM Korea, a joint venture in Korea with Oricom Inc. Seoul, one of the world's top 100 agencies. Dentsu returns, reflecting the broad range of its services, include Dentsu Prox, largely a TV ad production unit; AD Dentsu Tokyo, Osaka Nagoya, Kyushu and Hokkaido; Dentsu EYE, a woman's creative boutique; Dentsu Wunderman Direct; DCA Advertising, its New York operation. Dentsu Thailand and Dentsu's 27% ownership in HDM. Dentsu operations excluded from its advertising totals were Dentsu Printing; Dentsu Kosan, its real estate holdings; Dentsu Cotec, a commercial printer; Dentsu PR Centre; Dentsu Research Inc.; Dentsu Institute for Human Studies, a think-tank; Information Services International, a computer time-sharing joint venture with General Electric; Dentsu Burson Marsteller; its rep and liaison offices in Germany, Spain, etc., which don't operate as advertising agencies; and Dentsu Australia, acquired in September and not yet folded into the Dentsu account system.

Annual review

The agency is looking to increase its international business, which more than doubled in billings in 1989 to account for 19% (up from 11% growth in 1988) of Doner's worldwide billings. In Canada, the source of most of Doner's international growth, its Toronto and Montreal offices merged with Schur Peppler & Associates, Toronto, in forming Doner Schur Peppler with billings of $40 million. Expanding domestically, Doner opened a Boston office to handle the New England Ford Dealers Assn. account acquired late in 1988, and formed Consumer Diagnostics, a subsidiary marketing manufacturer-supported, health-screening programs to grocery stores. The agency won Uniroyal Goodrich Tire Co. ($15 million), VAX Appliances ($10 million) and Meijer Supermarkets ($10 million), which helped account for a 25.6% increase in total billings. The death in January 1990 of Wilfred B. Doner, agency founder and executive committee chairman, caused a reorganization in operating structure as chairman-CEO Herb Fried moved to head up operating committees in the co-headquarters of Southfield, Mich., and Baltimore. In early 1990, Isaac Lasky resigned as head of the in-house Hispanic marketing unit. Doner is looking at spinning off its Hispanic unit and merging it into an independent Hispanic agency.

Annual review

A growth rate of 7.5% is forecasted for 1990 based on new account gains from FHP ($5 million), the Dallas Times Herald and Del Webb Sun City project, each worth about $1.5 million. This will help soften the loss of $15 million in billings from the departures of Quaker State Minit Lube ($9 million), Alaska Seafood Marketing Institute and Frederick & Nelson (both about $3 million). Evans bought Ogilvy Group subsidiary Cole & Weber's Salt Lake City office. The agency secured exclusive North American rights to advertise on U.S.S.R.'s planned broadcast of the 1990 Goodwill Games in Seattle and is in a joint venture with King Broadcasting's Northwest Television Sales to sell Soviet time.

Annual review

French agency holding company Eurocom bought controlling interest in WCRS' advertising agency business in late 1989, giving birth to Eurocom WCRS Della Femina Ball. Structurally, the network is comprised of two halves, each managing various global regions. One half, known as EWDB Ltd., fully owns 100% of U.K., U.S. (largely Della Femina, McNamee/EWDB) and Asia/Pacific (Ball Partnership) agencies in the network. The other half, EWDB S.A., directly controls 30% of the French agencies, and fully controls the European agencies apart from France. However, Eurocom indirectly controls 100% of EWDB S.A., while WCRS directly controls 40% of EWDB Ltd. with the rest controlled by Eurocom. Since its founding, EWDB has expanded with agency acquisitions in Denmark, Germany, Italy and Spain. A new agency, Belier WCRS Espana, also was founded in 1989 prior to the advent of EWDB. EWDB estimates its net account gains in 1989 reached $267 million billings and included the Pan Am worldwide account. WCRS, out of its disinvestment in advertising, plied the $335 million it got from Eurocom to boost its holdings from 50% to 100% in Europe's independent media buying agency, Carat International.

Annual review

FCA! Group, an emerging Europewide network, expects growth of 18.8% in 1990 as it gains a full year's worth of billings from agencies purchased in 1989. Acquisitions included Brooks Legon Bloomfield in the U.K. which merged into the existing FCA! agency now called Manly Gilmore Jaume Hill Brooks FCA!, and CID, a five-shop Spanish agency in which FCA! purchased 25% after its previous Spanish partner, Vitruvio, left the group. FCA! purchased Paris and Bordeaux agencies that were merged into existing shops resulting in new names—Moors Olivier Chauvat Mougin, Paris, and Atlantique FCA!, Bordeaux. The group also formed FCA! Heslop Beguvin after FCA! parted with its existing agency in Belgium, and created Logo-FCA! in Stuttgart, West Germany. France remains the core of the FCA! network. The suburban Paris shop from which the network emerged remains the group's lead agency. Under the FCA! banner there are 16 French agency operations specializing in all aspects of advertising.

Annual review

A third-quarter streak of $100 million in new business gains at the Chicago office alone balanced shakeout losses from the FCB and Publicis Inc. alliance, and brought modest billings growth of 5.3% for 1989. FCB won Cadbury Schweppes' $20 million-plus Canada Dry and Sunkist; S.C. Johnson & Son and Kayser-Roth Hosiery both consolidated business at FCB, adding $40 million and $10 million, respectively; and existing client Coors awarded its $20 million Keystone and Keystone Light brands. Adding to gains, the San Francisco office landed the $75 million Taco Bell account in May and opened new offices in Atlanta, Dallas and Denver. Other new assignments: Levi Strauss & Co. ($22 million), RJR Nabisco ($150 million network, syndication and cable TV media buying) and Clorox detergent ($20 million). In February, FCB sold Golin/Harris Communications PR to Shandwick PLC, London, in exchange for Shandwick stock to increase presence in the global PR market and to prevent potential conflict of interest in FCB's unsuccessful pitch for Burger King (Golin/Harris handles McDonald's PR). As of February 1990, the New York office won the $8 million Jamaica Tourist Board account on condition of sale of FCB's 24% interest in Lindsay Smithers-FCB in Johannesburg. FCB totals include 49% of Publicis-FCB B.V. and 100% of FCB operations outside Europe.

Strong account gains, particularly the $12 million Access account win, offset the loss of Mazda to give the agency a 15.3% increase in billings in 1989. The London shop, well known for its creative work, is now better connected internationally through its holding company, GGT PLC, which purchased 50% of Austin, Texas-based GSD&M, a shop billing $150.8 million in 1989. GGT has an option to acquire the remainder through 1992. In May, GGT PLC acquired a leading Minneapolis agency, Martin/Williams. During the year GGT's Atlanta-based subsidiary, Babbit & Reiman, opened a New York office, and Coba, GGT's London-based management consultancy, opened Atlanta, New York and Paris offices.

■ Annual review

Grey continued to keep its sights glued to the international horizon in 1989. Grey Direct acquired a U.K. direct marketing agency, Dewar Coyle MacLean, and Grey International gained interest in a German shop and Netherlands pharmaceutical agency. Two New Zealand agencies were merged and renamed Grey-New Zealand. European business expanded by more than 25% in 1989 to pace international growth. Grey has turned in three consecutive years of double-digit growth overseas. It established a European Management Board, recently acquired the $15 million SmithKline Beecham's Contac account and the $8 million Ralston Purina Wonder bread account. This continued strength abroad added to heavy new assignment activity in the last quarter of 1989 helped produce a growth of $380.9 million in billings, up 13.2%. Increases from existing clients, led by Thompson Medical Co. and Procter & Gamble ($18 million Sure and $42 million Noxell Cover Girl), produced $254.8 million of the gain, while new accounts—in particular, Tonka ($8 million), Sun Diamond Growers of California ($7 million), 3M ($10 million), Vienna/Budapest World's Fair ($50 million over 5 years) and U.S. Department of Treasury ($15 million over three years)—generated $190.1 million in new billings to offset $64 million in lost billings. The agency sold its interest in LBS Communications, a syndicated TV operation, for $38 million. Norman Vale retired as managing director, Grey International, in early 1990 and will remain as a consultant. Assuming his duties are Frank Clarke, senior vp, and Rob Parker, senior vp-international finance.

A billings increase of 13.1% was attributed to the acquisition of the Sharp Electronics Corp. account ($26.2 million) and expanded billings from existing clients Hasbro ($18 million from its Coleco business), that offset the departure of $27 million in billings. Some $16.5 million of the losses were from other Hasbro business. A 6% growth in billings is predicted for 1990 based on expansion of existing accounts, including newly acquired Milton Bradley U.K. ($2.2 million) and Gruner & Jahr's Young Miss ($1 million).

Annual review
GSD&M in February 1990 became part of GGT Group, London, which purchased 50% of the Texas agency for an estimated $48.5 million with an option to buy the remainder through 1992. During 1989, GSD&M had a net billings increase of $26.7 million over 1988 that came mainly from increased spending from Wal-Mart, Texas Department of Commerce and Coors Brewing, aided by new accounts, Ben Hogan, CompuAdd Corp. and Domino's Pizza. These gains more than offset $12.3 million in billings that left with such clients as The Wall Street Journal ($10 million) and Mr. Gatti's Inc. pizza ($3 million). The employee count jumped by 37% and all business from former offices in Dallas, Houston and San Antonio was consolidated in Austin. Projections for 1990 of a 20% increase reflect "strong creative strides and prudent financial planning," reports GSD&M. GGT, whose head agency in London, Gold Greenlees Trott, is one of the world's 100 largest agencies, has been expanding rapidly in the U.S. In 1989, GGT acquired Martin/-Williams, Minneapolis, and in 1988, Babbit & Reiman, Atlanta.

Annual review
Billings growth of 9% in fiscal 1990 is predicted, reflecting a favorable business climate although not as robust as 1989 when Hakuhodo recorded growth of 12.9%. During 1989 the agency expanded its overseas network, establishing London and Paris subsidiaries, and local offices in Milan and Barcelona and Taipei. Domestically the agency participated extensively in expositions and fairs in Yokohama, Fukuoka and other cities, engaged in joint production and distribution in the movie industry and established new business for urban space development and satellite broadcasting. Hakuhodo has joint ventures with Lintas:Worldwide and McCann-Erickson Worldwide in Japan and will be servicing the Nissan corporate account in Europe with TBWA as partner. Hakuhodo and TBWA competed with two other Japanese-European agency "teams" in winning the account this January. The Japanese are forming such partnerships for account pitches because of the lack of Japanese offices in Europe.

Newly acquired accounts led by the Insurance Information Institute ($23.5 million), and healthy growth of $20.2 million in existing business including Nissan Motor Corp.'s Infiniti, Hyatt Hotels and Spalding Golf Balls, offset $37.8 million in lost business to produce a 2.7% increase in billings for 1989. The agency entered into a non-equity partnership with Wakeman & deForrest, forming Hill Holliday Wakeman deForrest in Marina del Rey, Calif. Layoffs hit both the New York office as several Revlon group accounts shook free, and the Boston headquarters as Royal Crown Cola pulled its $10 million account. During the last half of 1989, strong new account growth helped push overall billings up 5%. Gained during that stretch were the $15 million-$20 million Hasbro account for girls' toys, $12 million-$15 million Nestle Foods daytime network media buying and two Procter & Gamble accounts credited with $5 million in billings—all of which helped the agency overcome account departures worth $25 million in billings. In early 1990, Malcolm MacDougall, vice chairman, left to form his own consulting company with minority backing from the agency.

U.S. accounts
Gained: Reebok International Inc. (Rockport shoes); Quaker Oats Co. (Pritikin Systems); Hasbro Inc. (My Little Pony, new girls' toys); Milton Bradley Co. (Scattergories, Yahtzee, Memory, Trouble); Procter & Gamble (Top Job, Fisher Nuts, new prods).

Annual review

Domestic growth at Ketchum slipped only slightly to 17.7% in billings in 1989 from 19% in 1988 as the agency continued to build a client base with new account wins: Southwestern Bell Yellow Pages ($12 million), the broadcast creative portion of Foss Stores ($8-$10 million), French Government Tourist Office ($4 million), and consolidation of the Melitta USA business ($10 million). Losses included Roman Meal ($5 million), Pizza Hut of Washington ($3-$5 million) and Poqet Computer Corp. ($4 million), which it gained and lost during the year. Ketchum formed an international pr joint venture with MPR Leedex, London. Last November Ketchum/Hicks & Greist became Ketchum Advertising, New York.

U.S. accounts

Gained: Southwestern Bell, Ross Dress for Less, Palomar Hospital, STOR, William & Clarissa, Thermador/Waste King, Melitta, Prudential Properties, Singer Sewing Machine, French Government Tourist.

New business from Econo Lodges of America ($5 million) and increased spending from existing clients Clairol (Option, $5 million) and American Tobacco (Misty, $6 million, and American Lights, $2 million) wasn't enough to prevent an 8.9% decline in billings traced largely to the departure of the Thompson Medical account ($20 million). The agency predicts 2% revenue growth for 1990. LCFL is one of the three advertising arms of Lowe Group, London.

Annual review

The agency anticipates a growth rate of 20% in 1990 spurred in part by growth from new accounts in 1989. New account growth for the year hit $21.2 million and included $12 million from Trump Taj Mahal. Existing accounts added an additional $29.7 million in billings to more than offset the departure of $17 million in business, including the Citizen Watch account. The agency is a subsidiary of Grey Advertising, but its returns are not included in Grey's totals.

COLOR: A creative source of energy. Blue, Glade Jasmin white, HALLS Cherry red- always perceived differently. They are the kind of images, fragrances and flavours that we at Publi-Graphics love to expose you to.. and whether infra red or ultra violet we're the kind of Ad Agency that can take the heat.
NUMBERS: Our speciality. And we've learned to translate them into a basket of currencies to suit our Egyptian American and Japanese Clients.
CONCEPTS: The marketing concept is for all seasons. Ideas are universal.. and we get ours from listening very carefully to the customer's desire for value.
CORRESPONDENCES*: Our definition of Creativity. As an Ad Agency the principle by which we create, quality is best expressed in words that Baudelaire wrote at the turn of the Century, « Les parfums, les couleurs et les sons se répondent..» or in plain English, « Perfumes, colours and sounds answer each other ».
So if we listen very hard, the tune will come to us at last. And because sometimes words have two meanings, all we are saying is: give big ideas a chance ! Big yet simple, easy and clear. Like the sales promotion mechanics that we engineered for a « Global » Music Marketing minded Client of ours. This sales promo concept happily married colours with numbers so we called it Rainbow.
LET THERE BE MORE LIGHT
Just in case this sounds obscure... let us translate for you.

■ Annual review
Steady gains, amid the tough loss of the $55 million Noxell Corp. account, pushed Lintas' billings up 10.4%, although far behind 1988's 28.6% pace. Procter & Gamble bought Noxell in September and pulled it from Lintas, after 40 years of service, due to conflict of interest with Unilever. Eastern Airlines' bankruptcy in August mandated serious cuts in planned 1989 advertising, and, along with reduction in other existing clients' budgets, forced layoffs in New York. Also, the Michigan office lost Bridgestone USA's $10 million account in August. Existing clients rounded up substantial business: GM Chevrolet consolidated national advertising for Geo ($35 million) at the Michigan shop, which also drew an assignment from IBM to develop retail tactical marketing programs ($15 million-$20 million). Martlet Importing awarded its Molson Beer account ($10 million) to the New York shop, also the recipient of Unilever's Brut 33 account ($9 million). Australia drew Unilever's Unifoods subsidiary media buying account ($40 million) and France won SGEM Vittel ($10 million). In January 1990, the Toronto shop gained GM Corp.'s Canadian media buying account ($51 million), and worldwide creative responsibility of Diet Coke was consolidated with Lintas:WW, which picked up the overseas portion previously handled by McCann-Erickson. Lintas' sister agency in parent Interpublic. Eyeing the international market, it opened Lintas:Integrated Marketing Communications in Bangkok in April, with plans to expand throughout Southeast Asia. In June, Still Price Court Twivy D'Souza was bought and combined with Lintas' U.K. office. Lintas Marketing Communications was set up to encompass all non-media units in the U.S. In consolidating its worldwide management in the U.S., Kenneth Robbins, chairman-ceo of Lintas:International and deputy chairman of Lintas:WW, moved to New York from London. Separately, Barry Day moved to Lintas:WW as vice chmn-dir international advertising development after 18 years with McCann.

Lowe International, a network of international agencies owned by Lowe Group PLC holding company, was led in the billings race by Lowe Howard-Spink, U.K., its leading U.K. unit which gained more than $85 million in new business. The leading U.S. shop, Lowe Marschalk, pulled in the Prudential U.S. account worth $70 million, although its total billings declined by 15.4%. The Italian agency, Pirella Gottsche Lowe, gained more than $50 million in new accounts, including Braun. The network also grew through acquisition: Homer & Durham in the U.S. (folded into Lowe Tucker Metcalf), the remaining stock in Lowe Marschalk and 49% of Deacon Day Advertising, Canada. Lucinda Holmes became president of Lowe International in February 1990.

■ Annual review
After two years of 20%-plus billings growth, McCann dipped to 8.9% growth as Shearson Lehman Hutton ($20 million), American Express Gold Card ($25 million) and R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co.'s Camel and Winston domestic accounts ($55 million) exited. Gains from Nestle Food Corp.'s Taster's Choice ($24 million), consolidation of Nestle's $56 million U.K. grocery division at McCann and three new assignments from American Home Products relieved losses. Overseas volume, which traditionally accounts for about 70% of its billings, grew 10.1%, off from growth of 31% in 1988. McCann continued its international expansion by purchasing majority stake in a West German agency and opening Universal de Medios in Madrid, its first Spanish media-buying company. The new unit helped bring in new global accounts, among them Agfa Photo retail division, Europcar Car Rental, Lufthansa in SE Asia and Nabisco Brands cracker and snack advertising in the U.K. In Europe, McCann created Europe McCann Direct, a consolidation of its 14 direct-marketing offices there with combined $55 million billings. McCann plans to open an agency in the Soviet Union in April, 1990, and is seeking joint ventures in Poland and Czechoslovakia. In Canada, 51% of McCann/Foster was sold to former owners so the shop—now Foster Advertising—could retain its $8.5 million in government business. Among personnel changes, Sean Fitzpatrick, creative director behind Lintas' "Heartbeat of America" Chevrolet campaign, moved to McCann as vice chairman-chief creative officer, and Mike Ferrier succeeded Jerry Shively as chairman in London. Chairman-CEO Robert James added the title of president when John McNamara stepped down in January.

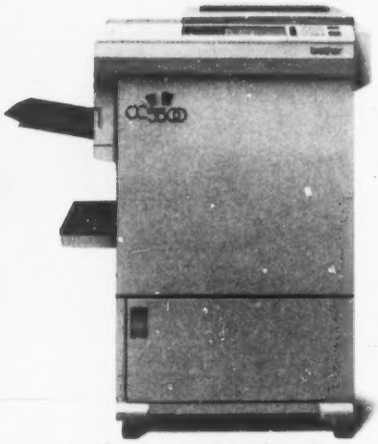
The Copy



The Original

The Originator.

At Brother, technology must do more than improve a product's performance. It must make the product more accessible, easier to use and affordable.

Take our CC5500 full-color copier. Not only does it produce incredibly crisp images copy after copy, it does so without messy toners, chemicals or ribbons.

That attention to basic user needs influences everything we make. Laser printers, fax machines and electronic typewriters for the office. Sewing machines and precision machine tools for industry. Hi-speed ovens, knitting machines, sewing machines and appliances for the home.

At Brother, the standard is simple. It's not breakthrough technology unless you're getting the break.

To see this standard in action, call Brother International Corp. 1-800-556-5100, Ext. 124.

We're at your side.

Annual review

WPP Group's hostile takeover of Ogilvy Group for $864 million in May generated management shakeups and client departures from subsequent account conflicts, but the agency's billings remained stable, aided by an especially strong 21.8% growth internationally. Creative Director Norman Berry resigned in June, leaving a gap not filled until Bill Hamilton joined O&M in November from the same post at Chiat/Day/Mojo, New York. In December Kenneth Roman, chairman-ceo of the Ogilvy Group, left for a position at American Express and Graham Phillips succeeded. Founder David Ogilvy added the title of WPP chairman. Earlier in the year, Peter Scarperi was named general manager of U.S. operations to aid Mr. Phillips, and Michael S. Lesser became president in New York. Foreign accounts continued to grow, markedly in the U.K. with gains of Ford Europe ($16 million), Argos Distributors ($15 million), Unilever and Lever Bros., bolstered by the February, 1990, gain of Spain's Expo '92, a $40 million account split between Madrid and London offices. Other foreign activity included adding Olivetti in Italy ($40 million), Brahma Beer in Rio ($20 million) and PTT in the Netherlands ($13 million). Losses included Lufthansa in Germany ($9 million), Polaroid pan-European ($20 million) and Shell in three countries ($20 million). Stateside, Maxwell House ($50 million) left midyear causing a 90-person layoff, but Paramount Pictures ($70 million) came aboard in February 1990. More than a $250 million gain in billings from existing clients such as American Express, Nestle and Compaq also contributed to the billings mix. In efforts to focus on the bottom line, O&M sold Euramerica, a language-translation and graphics subsidiary, and parted with Rolf Werner Rosenthal Inc., a $60 million-billing pharmaceutical agency. O&M/Zurich merged with Marti Werbeagentur for combined billings of $40 million, and an international joint media-buying agreement with Omnicom was reached forming The Media Partnership. Ogilvy & Mather Direct Response tallied a 14.2% growth in U.S. billings, or $33 million from a mix of $8.7 million in new business, $31 million in existing business and $6.7 million lost.

Orikomi, whose billings rose only 3.8% in 1989, expects a growth rate of 15% in billings in 1990, reflecting a GNP growth of 4-5% for the year in Japan. Part of the agency increase is based on new account acquisitions, including special events (golf, concerts among them). Orikomi consolidated figures also include its 60% ownership in Backer Spielvogel Bates/-Japan, part of the BSBW network within Saatchi & Saatchi PLC.

Annual review
Publicis-FCB B.V., a manifestation of the alliance struck between Foote, Cone & Belding Communications and Publicis Communications, the advertising side of the French holding company, Publicis S.A., is a combination of the mutual European holdings of the two companies into a single jointly-owned network. Most offices in the various countries have been merged, although some remain separate "to provide distinction and to avoid client conflicts," notes the network. There is a single chairman per country whose responsibilities cover all offices in that country. In 1989, the alliance acquired Italian agency MAC and merged it with Publicis, FCB, Park and Concept operations in that country; bought the Spanish agency Arge and 35% of French media-buyer, Interplan-Idemedia. B.V. also merged FCB Advertising and Mallet McCormick in the U.K.; Publicis and FCB in Netherlands and Spain; Publicis, Impact/FCB and Park in Belgium; Publicis and Ciesa/NCK in Portugal; and Publicis and FCB Goteborg in Sweden. B.V.'s executive committee got new leadership when Maurice Levy, chairman of the Paris agency, Publicis Conseil, added to his title the chairmanship of Publicis-FCB, replacing Craig Wiggins who became chairman, FCB International in New York. B.V. was separated from FCB's non-Europe holdings because the two are structurally linked only through minority investments Publicis and FCB hold in each other.

A strong list of new clients including Ponderosa ($17 million), Pizza Inn ($20 million), First Gibraltar and Tony Lama Co. easily cushioned the Long John Silver's loss as billings increased 23.4% in 1989. Annual review
Riney spent much of the year denying rumors that it was for sale. After its big win of Saturn Corp. ($80-$100 million) in 1988, the agency was expected to get $40-$50 million additional business from Saturn dealer groups. New accounts gained included $10 million Deere & Co., $10 million Informix Software, $7 million John Nuveen & Co. and $5 million Pharmavite vitamins which easily countered losses including $3 million Shaklee Corp. Best Water Purification System, and the $7 million Dreyer's Grand Ice Cream. Since August, 1989, ten executives have left including four who formed Atlas Citron Haligman & Bedecarre, San Francisco. This month Hal Riney, fielding the weekly "for sale" question, proffered a new headline: "For sale, no; merger, maybe . . . but with the right partner."

SYNDICATION CONFERENCE

New York Hilton, Tuesday, April 17, 1990

A Conference For Advertisers

Syndication has grown into a billion-dollar advertising medium in less than ten years. And it's expected to double again by 1995 – even as it continues to change America's viewing habits, and the structure of television itself.

The Advertiser Syndicated Television Association presents "Upfront '90," the second annual conference for the advertising community to come together to discuss this important medium.

Join top media experts from major advertisers, including Kraft General Foods, Procter & Gamble, American Cyanamid and Anheuser-Busch; agencies such as Leo Burnett, Lintas, Grey and Jordan McGrath, as well as TV producers, broadcasters and researchers as they discuss issues important to Syndication's continued growth.

And more! "Upfront '90" will offer...

- Case Histories
  Find out how savvy marketers have used Syndication to advantage
- Exciting Debates
  Has Syndication achieved parity to the networks? Watch top syndicators face off with leading media directors!

Annual review
Ross Roy forecasts 8% growth in 1990 from existing and new business. During 1989 when billings grew 14.6%, there was no major change in spending from existing clients, but the agency expanded through acquisition. It bought Group 243 in Ann Arbor and Nathan Fraser Agency in Toronto. Expansion through acquisition continued in early 1990 with the purchase of Anthony M. Franco Inc., Detroit's largest pr company. It will operate as an independent subsidiary. With offices in New York and Cleveland, Franco's 1989 fee income was $4.85 million. Ross Roy Retail also debuted in early 1990, as an outgrowth of last fall's K mart/CBS sweepstakes, to develop joint retailer/vendor promos and advertising for new and existing retail clients. Peter Vetowich, exec vp-director of retail operations, added the title of manager of Ross Roy Retail.

Annual review
Growth by acquisition characterized RSCG as it opened 1989 with the buyout of KLEM, Casablanca, Morocco's second-largest agency, and launched 1990 by taking over KLP Group, London, and firing its managing director, Gerry Postlethwaite. In between, RSCG gained a stronger U.S. foothold by buying 51% of Messner Vetere Berger Carey Schmetterer, New York, in March and Lally McFarland Pantello, New York, in September, prior to purchasing Chapman/-Palavidis in Athens in October and the creation of RSCG Portugal, Lisbon, in December. RSCG typically takes 51% equity in an agency, leaving the remainder in local hands, but expands its ownership incrementally—a process that includes exchanging shares of RSCG with owners of the local agency. RSCG is buying a majority interest in Madell Wilmot Pringle & Partners, London, to handle the Citroen account in the U.K., thereby terminating RSCG's link with Woollams Moira Gaskin O'Malley there, in which it held 26% equity. RSCG's biggest agency outside Europe is Chicago's Tatham-Laird & Kudner, owned 70% by RSCG.

Annual Review
An $11.2 million increase in billings from existing accounts dominated the billings mix that also drew $3.2 million in new business gains. No clients departed the agency. Existing clients particularly stimulating growth were Home Federal Bank, Yokohama Tire and American Honda Corp. Early in the year, the agency drew praise for its work for American Honda that featured a mock-up of the Stealth bomber to introduce the Honda CRX Si. Growth of 10%-12% is predicted for 1990 from new and existing business.

Annual review
As parent Saatchi & Saatchi PLC suffered an earnings decline and looked at putting on the block much of its consulting companies, it made an avowed commitment to refocus on advertising. Winning the retail half of the $215 million Burger King account midyear became the largest parcel of new business that Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising has won since 1987. For the whole year, the agency gained $198 million worldwide from new accounts gained, including $20-$25 million Thompson Medical's Dexatrim (plus Cafferdrine, Cortizone 5 and Encare). The biggest chunks of the $49 million in billings that left with departing clients were $10 million each for CPC International Best Food's Skippy peanut butter and Pioneer Electronics. Overseas account gains included $60 million Johnson & Johnson pan-European TV and print sanitary products campaign, and $30 million Unicliffe's Plax dental rinse launch in Europe, Africa, the Middle East and India. Losses included $40 million worth of TV buying in the U.K. for H.J. Heinz (to comply with Mars client-conflict policy) and $35 million Toyota Australia although it kept part of the business. Gary Susnjara resigned as president-coo of Saatchi & Saatchi DFS in May to pursue independent consulting after 22 years at the agency. Michael Keeshan was promoted to president-coo of the New York office and Edward Wax became president-ceo of Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising, the North American unit of Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising Worldwide, assuming the responsibilities previously held by O. Milton Gossett and Stuart Upson, who continue as co-chairmen-ceos. The Torrance, Calif., and San Francisco offices were merged into a new group, Saatchi & Saatchi DFS/Pacific. John Hirschboeck succeeded David Wager who resigned as president of Saatchi & Saatchi Team One, formed mainly to handle the estimated $60 million Lexus account. In December Gary Landis was moved to vice chairman, a new post at Saatchi & Saatchi Affiliate Group, from president-coo of McCaffrey & McCall which is buying itself back from Saatchi. He was succeeded by William Vieser, formerly vice-chairman, director of client services. Midyear Werner Goerke, chmn-ceo of Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising, Frankfurt, was named the company's first European director for international client services to oversee work for marketers taking a pan-European approach—starting with Procter & Gamble. Saatchi & Saatchi Direct Worldwide, Paris, merged with Cezame Conseil to create Cezame/Saatchi & Saatchi Direct. Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising Worldwide, London, bought a majority share in Jahnsson & Sjogren, Stockholm, and ended its affiliation with Blanking, Malmo. Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising Japan was formed by the merger of Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising K.K. and Yomiko DFS, both located in Tokyo. At yearend, the Saatchi brothers, Maurice and Charles, turned over the reins of the holding company to its first outsider, Robert Louis-Dreyfus, who was the former IMS International Research chief.

Annual review
Limited dollar growth in billings is predicted this year by Salles Inter-Americana because of strong economic measures likely to be imposed by the new government to bring Brazil's rampant inflation under control. During 1989, Salles increased its equity in GTM&C, Sao Paulo, from 49% to 60%. It included 49% of GTM&C's results in its results in 1989 and 35% of another agency, ASA-Criacao de Publicidade, Belo Horizonte. Salles boosted its creative department by hiring Neil Ferreira, a well-known creative in Brazil. Agency president, Luiz Salles, was kidnapped by extortionists in July and held captive for 67 days. He was released unharmed.

Continued pressure on billings growth will be felt in 1990 by the agency, which in 1989 recorded a year-to-year increase of 5.5%, down from double-digit growth in 1988. Growth in 1990 should be about 5% in billings. Subsidiary Standard McIntyre K.K., specializing in medical advertising and half-owned by the parent company, contributed $3.9 million to Standard's total 1989 billings. Standard also holds 45% of Talkback Japan and 30% of Image Communication K.K., a production subsidiary, both in Tokyo.

More than 20% growth is projected in 1990 as a result of anticipated increases in business related in part to full-year activity from its launch of Graf Bertel Dominique, New York, and new agency acquisitions: Kerlick, Switzer & Johnson, St. Louis, and Greenwich, Conn.-based Posey Quest Genova in which TBWA took a 50% position. TBWA shifted $15 million in Beiersdorf and Sandoz consumer healthcare accounts to the latter in late 1989. Overall, the agency reported $40 million in billings gains from new business including acquisitions ($6 million Boatmen's Bank; $5 million in regional Taco Bell; $3 million Chase Manhattan and $2.5 million Steuben accounts). Existing clients increased their spending by $30.5 million to more than cover the $3 million in billings lost

The sluggish U.K. stock market was blamed for the failed attempt by Scali to buy back majority control from WPP Group in early 1990. Scali managers currently own 20% of the shop as part of a previous minority buyback from Ogilvy Group, itself acquired in 1989 by WPP. Scali consists of a single flagship office and a loose "confederation" of overseas partners in which it typically owns a majority. Scali owns 80% of both Fallon McElligott, Minneapolis, and the Martin Agency, Richmond, Va., which have witnessed defections of founding partners since the acquisition of majority interest. The Scali billings mix in 1989 included gains of $20 million from new accounts and $11.3 million from existing clients that offset $17.7 million in lost billings. The most notable loss was the October departure of Hertz ($22 million) which had been put up for review. Wins included Pella ($9 million) and Lotus software ($5-$7 million).

A strong push for new accounts brought $47.8 million billings in new business to the agency for the year as business from existing clients increased $15.2 million in billings. The agency, which recorded a 48.8% growth in international billings, lost only $8 million billings from departing clients for a net gain of $55 million in billings worldwide. The Yellow Page specialist agency with 17 global offices operates an "800" number fulfillment subsidiary that billed $1.7 million in 1989. Overall, growth of 15%-20% in billings is expected in 1990, slightly down from last year's 29%.

Annual review

Armando Testa experienced an 8.6% decline in billings in lira, fueled in part by the loss of Bistefani (biscuits) business and a decline in the lira exchange rate. The agency added two offices, giving it representation in Italy, U.S., Spain and France. Media Italia S.p.A., a unit specializing in special events, pr and sponsorship, contributed $49 million or almost one-fifth of total billings.

Annual review

in U.S. billings but a hearty 23.5% growth abroad. Big domestic gains included Goodyear ($40 million), Snapper Power Equipment ($24 million), Lever Bros.' Wisk ($13 million) and Circuit City Stores ($25 million). Abroad, the agency gained the $20 million account for Repsol, Spain's state-owned oil company, but lost Benson & Hedges in Australia ($7 million) after 27 years. In early 1990, the agency lost its year-old account, Eyelab ($12 million), when it was bought by Pearle, lost the $35 million Deutsche Bank (Frankfurt) media-buying account, and was a leading contender for the $50 million Continental Airlines business. On the international side in 1989, JWT joined Omnicom Group and Ogilvy & Mather as partners in Media Partnership, a European media-buying consortium, built up its equity from 25% to 70% in the Malaysia office and expanded the Melbourne, Australia office. Among personnel changes abroad, where the agency added 288 more employees and 11 offices, Dominique Simonin was named chmn-ceo for European operations and Miles Colebrook moved to president-coo of the same. In South Africa, 13 employees resigned over a disagreement with the future direction of the agency there. The Chicago office fired 12 and hired five new members of its creative staff. JWT is owned by WPP Group PLC, London.

Annual review

Warwick Advertising, which changed its name to Warwick Baker & Fiore, experienced a net billings growth of $10 million, including $8 million in billings each from new and existing accounts (including new products from Sterling Drug and Van Munching) while losing $6 million from clients exiting the shop. Cautiously optimistic about the economic climate, the agency projects growth in 1990 to be 4%-6%, slightly shy of 6.3% in 1989. Warwick is 40% owned by Alliance International, an international network of agencies that is owned by Lopex PLC.

Annual review

With new business up $79.7 million, which includes major billings contributions from Sheraton Corp. hotels and Hertz Corp. ($25 million each), the agency more than offset lost billings from Folgers Gourmet Supreme coffee ($10 million) and Procter & Gamble's Sure deodorant ($18 million). WRG did keep P&G's Gain, Spic 'n Span, Pringles, Oil of Olay and added new unnamed products. WRG also won Polo/Ralph Lauren account ($10 million) and Wedgwood ($2 million). It closed the St. Louis-based Gardner Advertising with reported $106 million billings (mostly from Advanswers Media/Programming media buying service) after losing Ralston Purina ($10 million) and Southwestern Bell Yellow Pages ($12 million) accounts. Gardner president Paula Kahn became exec vp-new business in the New York office and Gardner's remaining accounts—Mazzio's Corp. (pizza) and Southwestern Bell Mobile Systems worth a combined $3 million—were absorbed into the Chicago office. Additional business from existing clients included Warnaco's Ungaro line and MCI Communications residential and international products. WRG survived an unofficial agency review in early 1990 by Philip Morris and retained its $40-$60 million Benson & Hedges cigarette account.

■ Annual review

Y&R's billings growth in 1989 of 16% worldwide outpaced its 1988 growth rate of 9.9% as the agency gathered in sizable new business including Camel cigarettes ($25 million) from R.J. Reynolds Tobacco and First Nationwide Financial Corp. ($15-$20 million) domestically and in Europe with Quaker's Gatorade ($20 million) launch, Reckitt & Colman's Airwick air freshener ($17 million pan-Europe), British Gas ($18-$20 million) and Johnson & Johnson Carefree sanitary product line ($10 million in 11 European markets). Big losses included Mulino Bianco's Barilla foods ($44 million), Pillsbury Brands Group ($4.8 million) and Jamaica Tourism Board ($6-$8 million). The latter resulted in plea bargaining on federal racketeering and bribery charges and management reshuffling. Y&R settled with WPP which had sued Y&R for its role in the management breakaway at LGFE, New York. Y&R contributed 49% equity to the breakaway agency, Lord, Einstein O'Neill & Partners. Y&R sold Stone & Adler, Chicago, to HDM; reorganized its Detroit office into automotive and diversified account divisions; bought interest in GEO II, Athens, Greece; merged its Impact Italia with Dolci MC to form Impact Dolci; acquired 40% of Skala Recklam Studio, Budapest; finalized plans for a pan-European, media-buying operation with other agency partners including HDM; bought Hall & Cederquist, Stockholm, to be merged with an existing Y&R agency; dissolved its partnership, Fischer, Justus, Y&R Brazil; bought Landor Associates, design company, and opened a Minneapolis satellite office. In early 1990 Tim Pollak was named president-ceo of Y&R's New York office, succeeding Arthur Klein who becomes managing director for joint venture operations. Mr. Pollak was succeeded by Gary Burandt as HDM Worldwide ceo. Mr. Burandt was ceo-Y&R Sovero, Moscow. Effective May 1, Peter Georgescu, Y&R Advertising president, becomes president of Y&R Inc., succeeding Alexander Kroll who continues as chairman-ceo. Joseph De Deo, Y&R Europe president, succeeds Mr. Georgescu.

*Y&R claims only 30% of HDM billings in the U.S. or $74.1 million.

Y&R claims 29% of HDM Europe and 40% Asia-Pacific or $747.3 million.

Advertising Age's annual selection of Agency of the Year is based on evaluations, by a committee of our editors, of the creative product of the nominated agencies. Creativity, rather than size or new-business success, is given primary consideration to allow agencies of all sizes to compete.

Nominations are made by Ad Age staff members; consideration is also given to nominations put forth by others, including the agencies themselves. □

ment in which people could create their best work," Mr. Berlin said—after they had moonlighted together on a project while working at Ogilvy.

They were all creatives: Messrs. Goodby and Berlin were copywriters and Mr. Silverstein an art director. But they rejected the conventional wisdom that start-ups should have at least one "suit," or heavy-hitting account person.

Relying on their instincts and a computer accounting program of dubious accuracy put together by Mr. Berlin, the three thought they could make money as well as great ads.

The agency attracted clients by assuring them one of "the guys"—now called "the partners"—would be intimately involved in the work.

Now, with 15 clients and 60 employees, that's not as easy, but "we still run the place," Mr. Goodby said. "We still have the ideas behind the work."

Despite its innovative creative product, which has helped it serve as a model for other new agencies, Goodby has struggled on the business side.

"I understand they haven't felt they've achieved their financial goals," Mr. Riney said.

"Where's our big national client?—ask me that," said Mr. Silverstein, conceding the agency isn't as big as it thought it would be by now.

The agency thought it had landed that big national account last September, when it won the Pioneer Electronics business, but the agency and client weren't compatible and the relationship ended within two months.

"We weren't the right agency for Pioneer," Mr. Berlin said.

The agency also tried to grow through an infusion of funds from London-based Boase Massimi Pollitt, to which Goodby sold a one-third interest. But BMP subsequently was acquired by Omnicom Group, New York, from which Goodby is negotiating the repurchase of its stock.

The agency believes it found the right "suit"—now conceded to be necessary—last August, when it hired Colin Probert, 43, former president of BMP North America, as its president.

Early this year, the agency restructured, giving Mr. Berlin sole responsibility for administration. Mr. Probert reports to Mr. Berlin.

"It's the end of three guys sitting in a room making all the decisions together," Mr. Berlin said.

But as Goodby seeks growth and becomes more businesslike, the agency insists it will maintain the delicate environment that's nourished it creatively.

A creative department, Mr. Goodby said, "has to have a certain amount of irreverence and brattiness and free-spiritedness. You hide it from the outside world as much as possible, but you guard it inside. If you get too predictable, it's real bad for your creative product, not to mention your life." □ painting, effectively showing all Nugget's colors.

The element of surprise pops up again in a commercial for the National Institute for Social Affairs, a government program encouraging elderly people to travel in the off-season.

In one spot, a suitcase is thrown onto a bed and the shapely legs of a woman in a skirt and high-top tennis shoes scurry around the bedroom. As a silk blouse, makeup and jeans are packed in the case, voice-over says, "If you're independently minded . . . this winter, leave home. Now you're old enough."

In the end, viewers discover the sneakers are worn by a spunky silver-haired lady on the go.

In contrast to this approach, sometimes simplicity is the key. In a spot encouraging Spaniards to vote in last year's European Parliament elections, children of different nationalities sing the European Community's anthem in the middle of a government hall.

As the spot closed on the EC symbol, the point became clear: "Vote with Europe."

Another simply told message is a commercial for Epilady. The agency chose a single image, a fresh peach, to show the product's function; the hair remover takes the fuzz off a peach without harming the fruit.

The story of Contrapunto's success is also being told by its gross income and billings growth.

Gross income hit $11.8 million in 1989 while billings reached $78.8 million, both up 15% from 1988.

The agency's most recent new-business coup was the $14.3 million Spanish Alfa Romeo car account, won last October from WPP Group's Conquest Europe.

"Alfa Romeo will be a big test for the agency," said Tomas Corominas, general manager of Contrapunto's Madrid office. Spain is Alfa Romeo's second-largest market after its home country, Italy.

The agency is developing Alfa Romeo's first TV campaign for Spain, which may be used in other European markets.

"We're hoping to work on all of Alfa Romeo's pan-European advertising, but we have to go step by step," Mr. Mancebo said.

Just as the agency openly refuses to handle assignments with strict predetermined guidelines on creativity, Contrapunto also rejects the organizational structure of traditional agencies.

"We believe in democracy in business—that's why we have chosen a horizontal structure, rather than a vertically organized company," Mr. Marcos said.

Contrapunto is run by a management team made up of its three founding members, each owning 10%. In addition to Mr. Marcos, the co-founders are Rafael Sarro, ceo, and Jose Garcia, a member of the executive managment committee.

Despite such titles as president, no one is dominant over the others.

"All decisions are made by majority," Mr. Marcos said.

Six other top executives also hold shares in the company.

"This gives you a solid base in a business as volatile as ours," Mr. Marcos said. □

Advertising Age's annual selection of International Agency of the year is based solely on the agency's creative product. Creativity, not a shop's size or success, is paramount. □

International Agency of the Year runners-up

Hakuhodo
Tokyo

Visually striking ads, such as spots for Matsushita Electric Industrial Co., propelled Hakuhodo to runner-up status. Judges were particularly impressed with innovative work for Meiji Mutual Life Insurance Co.'s dental insurance plan, humorously demonstrating potential dental catastrophes.

Twin fluorescent lights electrify the sky in this Matsushita Electric Industrial Co. spot.

BDDP Group
Paris

Photography of TV spots that's as painstakingly crisp as art for its print ads earned BDDP its slot. Work for Kronenbourg's 1664 beer offers a series of memorable images; ads for Devanlay's Scandale lingerie feature titillating copy. □

Visual appeal attracts reader attention to this unusual beer ad. BDDP beautifully sells 1664 beer.

Notes: Dollars are in millions. $1 million in billings per employee is computed by dividing total U.S. billings in millions by total U.S. employees. See Page S-20 for methodology. Agencies listed are the top 100 ranked U.S. agencies. Subsidiary employee and billing totals (not shown) are included in parent totals.

Bridal books steal the show

By Scott Donaton

Here come the brides.

Since most couples get engaged in December and January, February is traditionally a big month for bridal magazines. So it's no surprise Conde Nast Publications' Bride's led all other magazines tracked by Publishers Information Bureau in ad pages, followed closely by Cahners Publishing Co.'s Modern Bride.

Bride's carried a record 790.68 ad pages in its February/March issue, up 7.2% from last year. The 1,040-page issue was submitted to the "Guinness Book of World Records" as the largest-ever consumer magazine.

Modern Bride also set a record with its February/March issue: 631.45 ad pages, up 3.2%.

"February's a great month for the bridal market because these are the women who received their engagement rings over Christmas and New Year's and are planning spring weddings," said Bride's Publisher Elliot Marion.

But February wasn't as kind to other magazines. Total ad-page counts fell an anticipated 1.5% from a year earlier to 13,849.5. Although the drop was considerably less than January's 4.8% slide, combined ad pages for the two months were off 3.7% to 24,175.39.

TV Guide, third behind Bride's and Modern Bride, was down 18.7% to 537 ad pages for the first two months of 1990. No. 6 People carried 409.74 ad pages, a 13.2% decline.

Women's service magazines also posted weak results, with ad pages down an average 11.9% for the first two months. Hearst Corp.'s Good Housekeeping, with 218.68 pages (up 3.3%), was the only title among the Seven Sisters to see an increase. Redbook, another Hearst title, was down 12.3% with 139.13 ad pages.

Meredith Corp.'s Better Homes & Gardens carried 160.79 ad pages in the first two months, a 13.4% drop. Sister publication Ladies' Home Journal saw pages for the first two months fall 8.4% to 196.03. Category leader Family Circle carried 232.82 pages through February, down 20.1%. After a 25% slide in January, McCall's was flat in February with 90.38 pages. Its year-to-date total is down 11.9% to 146.27 pages. Woman's Day saw pages fall 20.4% for the period to 165.36.

Among the top three business magazines, only Forbes posted gains after two months, giving category leader Business Week a run for its money. Forbes, an every-other-weekly, carried 466.72 pages through February, a 17.3% jump. Business Week, with 471.9 ad pages, was off 11.4%. Fortune carried 397.92 ad pages, a 5% decline.

Several second-tier business titles posted strong results. Entrepreneur led all business monthlies with 371.17 ad pages, up 12.8%. The Economist carried 365.95 pages, up 24.3%. Money carried 184.7 ad pages through February, an increase of 5.5%. Changing Times was up 6.8%, with 104.22 pages. Inc., with 170.01 pages, was up 21.9%.

General sports books were down. Sports Illustrated carried 394.65 pages, down 15.1%. The Sporting News saw pages drop 11.9% to 76.12, and Sport carried 50.22 ad pages, down 24.7%.

Elsewhere, The New Yorker was up 15% through February with 329.67 ad pages. Golf Digest's pages rose 17.8% to 250.43, while Rolling Stone carried 226.57 ad pages, up 6.6%. Town & Country was up 17% with 215.32 ad pages. Vanity Fair posted a gain of 9.8% to 150.13 pages. And Premiere, with 112.17 ad pages, was up 15.6%.

Among Sunday newspaper magazines tracked by PIB, The Los Angeles Times Magazine posted a 19.2% decline with 108.77 ad pages. The New York Times Magazine saw its pages fall 8% to 455.36, while Parade's pages dropped 5% to 97.1. USA Weekend, with 102.66 pages, was up 7.5%. □

Shades of summer

Suncare products fight slower sales

By Pat Sloan

Procter & Gamble Co.'s Bain de Soleil is changing its colors—again.

Two years ago, Bain de Soleil redefined the "St. Tropez tan" by lightening up veteran model Chris Zeimer to a lightly toasted hue from a deep brown.

Now, the marketer has a new angle on the most fashionable tan under the sun. Three different shades of tans will be featured in print ads breaking in April magazines and in TV spots airing around Memorial Day.

Themed "Beautiful color today. Beautiful skin tomorrow," the ads show Ms. Zeimer restored to her former bronzed self but accompanied by more lightly tanned models.

Rosenfeld, Sirowitz, Humphrey & Strauss, New York, is the agency.

"In consumer research, we found over two-thirds of women surveyed feel more attractive, healthier with a tan," said a spokeswoman for Richardson-Vicks, the P&G unit that markets Bain de Soleil. "We wanted to focus on the fact that Bain de Soleil offers a range of products that allow you to choose the color you desire."

The company is also running separate print ads under "The beautiful color" theme for Exact Couleur, a new cream that tans without exposure to the sun.

No. 3 ranked Bain de Soleil isn't the only player trying to more effectively segment the $500 million-plus suncare category. The category's growth slowed to about 10% last year after several years of high double-digit gains fueled by sunscreen sales.

Jack Surrette, VP-marketing at Tanning Research Labs, the No. 2 suncare marketer, said, "There's no question about segmenting, and our advertising will show the same thing. We're moving away from institutional ads. It's indicative of the market where there are so many subcategories."

In the past, Tanning Research Labs has been best known for its Hawaiian Tropic tanning products. The company also has a number of other spinoffs such as Sunsitive with hypoallergenic protection.

"Our brand identity is solidly entrenched, but we've got state-of-the-art formulas that we've in effect kept secret because we haven't addressed them," Mr. Surrette said. He noted that ads from Babbit & Reiman, Atlanta, this year will focus on sunscreens, self-tanning, paba-free products and new products with "100% natural protection."

For some time, Plough, the category leader with a 35% share, has marketed several lines including Coppertone, Tropical Blend and Shade.

For 1990, the company is increasing ad spending 20% to $10 million-plus and shifting its focus to print from TV.

"Magazines enhance segmentation," said Steve Bobowski, VP-suncare marketing. "They give us the chance to hone in and tell our story on each of our different products."

For example, the Coppertone brand will run eight- and four-page ads spotlighting different products via Della Femina, McNamee WCRS, New York.

Under the Coppertone umbrella, Plough also markets Water Babies sunscreens for kids. The fast-growing children's segment is getting crowded, but Plough thinks there may be room for one more brand.

Last year, it tested a line of Mickey Mouse sunscreens and is now negotiating with Walt Disney Co. for a national launch.

The children's segment is one of the few that's been pioneered by the mass market and not the upscale department store trade. Department store sales account for 20% of the category.

Estee Lauder Inc., one of the leaders in department store suncare for adults, will add its first children's product this year, called Baby Block Children's Waterproof Sunscreen SPF 30+.

Although department store brands have lagged in this segment, they're still innovative in others. Those brands were the first to differentiate between the two types of ultraviolet rays, and the brands' next hot button will be infrared rays, said Lauder Senior VP-Creative Marketing June T. Leaman.

This spring, Lauder ads from AC&R, featuring model Paulina Porizkova, will tout the benefits of the Special Protection Complex ingredient in fighting damage from all three types of rays.

Department stores are also pushing year-round protection. That concept is filtering down to the mass market, where products like Plough's Shade are now being purchased out of season by some shoppers for everyday use.

Tanning Research Labs' 100% natural protection product, called Hawaiian Tropic Daily Protective Moisturizer, is also described on packaging as an anti-aging formula.

Unilever's upscale Elizabeth Arden division is so committed to year-round protection that the company has stopped advertising seasonal suncare products to concentrate on products like Immunage Defense Lotion and Cream. The spot TV, print and direct-mail effort will be handled in-house.

"We view protection as a greater issue and need than [just] from Memorial Day through Labor Day," said VP-Marketing James Miner. □

Last month, 1,000 adults were polled by phone. The survey's margin of error is plus or minus 3.1%.

Among other changes in February:

- Despite finishing second in unaided recall, Pepsi-Cola led aided awareness within the soft-drink category, named first by 35.2% of survey respondents. Coca-Cola was second with 32.6% and Diet Coke third with 12.6%.
- Ford placed third in unaided overall recall. But when respondents were specifically asked to recall car and truck advertising, 22.1% named Chevrolet first, followed by Ford with 21.8%. Toyota was a distant third with 8.4%.
- In the fast-food category, McDonald's Corp. was named first by 55.7% of the respondents, followed by Burger King Corp.'s 10% and Wendy's International's 8.1%. □

Campbell drops 3 shops

By Judann Dagnoli

Campbell Soup Co. bid farewell to DDB Needham Worldwide, Hal Riney & Partners and Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising late last week as it reassigned $35 million in billings in an agency consolidation.

With the move, Campbell trims its roster from eight agencies to five.

The big winners in the realignment are FCB/Leber Katz Partners and BBDO Worldwide, New York.

FCB/Leber Katz, already agency for Prego spaghetti sauce, picked up $19.5 million in additional Campbell business, including the $11.5 million V-8 vegetable juice account from Saatchi, London, and the $8 million Souper Combos account from BBDO. The additional business brings FCB/Leber Katz's total Campbell billings to $29.5 million.

BBDO's loss was more than offset by the addition of the $8 million Swanson frozen food account from Riney, San Francisco, and the $7.5 million Mrs. Paul's seafood business from DDB Needham, New York.

BBDO already handled Home Cookin' and Chunky soups; it now has $36.5 million in Campbell billings.

Assignments for the company's other agencies are unchanged.

Backer Spielvogel Bates, New York, continues on Campbell's flagship $30 million red-and-white soup account; Ogilvy & Mather keeps its $15 million Pepperidge Farm business, the $5 million Great Starts account and the $8 million Le Menu assignment. W.B. Doner & Co., Southfield, Mich., continues as agency of record for Vlasic Foods.

What's behind roster cuts

By Julie Liesse

Campbell Soup Co.'s decision to pare its agency roster is part of a growing wave of consolidation by the nation's leading food marketers.

"There seems to be an increase in the incidence of food companies trimming their agency rosters," said Brian Goodall, exec VP at Bayer Bess Vanderwarker, Chicago, a core agency for Quaker Oats Co. "This may just be part of food companies' overall attempt to get leaner and meaner."

Sara Lee Corp. and Ralston Purina Co. are now involved in agency reviews, and Pillsbury Foods consolidated its food products at Leo Burnett USA, Chicago, last fall. Pet Inc. named D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles, St. Louis, its agency of record earlier this year, replacing a number of shops.

Sara Lee's European coffee and groceries unit last year consolidated $100 million in spending at four agencies, down from more than 40 (AA, Jan. 9, 1989).

'Crazy' idea: truthful ads

By Marcy Magiera

Ads are the stars in Paramount Pictures' "Crazy People," a zany movie starring Dudley Moore that could be subtitled "How to get ahead in advertising."

It may also start tongues wagging about the ethics of advertising.

Mr. Moore plays an agency creative named Emory Leeson with a familiar problem—he has to produce great ads for several clients, is on deadline and gets stuck for an idea.

With his back against the wall, he resorts to . . . truth.

The result: An ad for Volvo North America Corp. that calls the cars "Boxy, but good," and notes that while Volvos aren't very sexy, in this day and age of disease sexy isn't all it's cracked up to be.

Sexy is, however, a selling point for Jaguar Cars, another client (which apparently sees no conflict with Volvo). Mr. Leeson produces a Jaguar ad that promises, "You'll get hand jobs from beautiful women you hardly know."

Another ad, for Procter & Gamble Co.'s Metamucil, takes a direct tack: "It helps you go to the toilet. If you don't use it, you'll get cancer and die."

Even comparative advertising gets Mr. Leeson's brand

Yellow Pages group offers brand buys

By Patricia Strnad

TROY, Mich.—The Yellow Pages Publishers Association is developing a rate card for brand advertising as it gears up for a nationwide test of brand ads in Yellow Pages directories.

The trade group, representing publishers, authorized sales reps and suppliers, is collecting rates for half-page brand ads from publishers in the top 25 U.S. markets. The rates will be compiled into a single rate card.

For the first time, advertisers will have the option of placing their brand ads regionally, nationally or in individual books. They will receive one bill.

Within 60 days, the Yellow Pages group will pitch the category-linked, "brand-sell" concept to package-goods marketers and hopes to line up three-to-five advertisers for the 18-month test.

National brand advertising isn't expected to generate significant additional revenue for Yellow Pages publishers. Instead, the test is intended to show package-goods marketers the power and reach of the medium.

The association has hired two independent research companies to monitor the ads' reach and effectiveness. Each advertiser will specify what it hopes to gain from the test; research will be tailored to that advertiser's goals.

'Enquirer-Star' team to bring both clout

By Scott Donaton

G.P. Group is likely to create a combination ad package buy for the National Enquirer and Star.

The acquisition of the Star by National Enquirer's parent company could bring more respect and national advertising for the two supermarket tabloids.

Rupert Murdoch's News Corp. last week said it had agreed to sell the Star to G.P. Group, publisher of the National Enquirer and Weekly World News, for $400 million in cash and stock.

Macfadden Holdings, backed by Boston Ventures Ltd., acquired G.P. Group last year from the family of National Enquirer founder Generoso Pope Jr. for $412.5 million. The company outbid such global media giants as Maxwell Communications Corp. and Diamandis Communications Inc. after a highly publicized, four-month-long auction.

G.P. Group said it won't merge the Star with the Enquirer, but will maintain the editorial independence of both books.

The National Enquirer sells an average of 3.6 million copies on newsstands each week, almost 90% of its 4.1 million total circulation. The Star sells 3.1 million copies on newsstands, 86% of its 3.6 million weekly circulation.

Both magazines rank among the top six in the country in terms of single-copy sales.

Macfadden President Michael Boylan said he's considering a combination ad buy that would link the two titles.

"If there is an effective way to tie them together that makes sense, we will do it," Mr. Boylan said. "Combined, they reach 30 million readers a week. That's an extremely powerful audience."

Media buyers said a package deal could help the titles woo national advertisers—especially package-goods marketers—who have shied away from the tabloids because of their sensationalist reputations.

"I see the Star, because it is more mainstream and accepted by advertisers, helping the Enquirer," said Gene Wilhoft, director of media services for Grace & Rothschild, New York.

"There are a lot of package-goods advertisers that may have gone as far as the Star but haven't taken the next step to the Enquirer. This deal may help some of them make that leap," he said.

If the tabloids become a major force in package-goods advertising, it will enable them to compete with such major players as Time Warner's People and the "Seven Sisters" women's service magazines.

"Certainly, it increases their presence in the publishing business," said John Grey, senior VP-director of media planning, J. Walter Thompson USA. "The Enquirer is a very strong medium, but it's grossly underrated by a lot of agencies and clients. The management of Macfadden is dedicated to erasing lingering misconceptions about the Enquirer.

"As they break down resistance, they'll bring in more package-goods advertisers," he said. "Each advertiser they bring in will make it that much easier to bring in the next one. Over the long run, they can both be much healthier publications."

The Star carried 562 ad pages last year, according to Publishers Information Bureau figures, up 10.9% over the previous year. No figures were available for the National Enquirer.

A News Corp. spokeswoman said the Star sale was part of News Corp.'s plan to sell various assets to fund such projects as Sky Television in the U.K. and the company's 1988 $3 billion acquisition of Triangle Publications. □

Riney racks up losses

By Raymond Serafin

Hal Riney & Partners, which lost the Perrier Group account last week, is facing new defections from the creative team handling its $100 million Saturn Corp. business.

Senior Writer George Gier and Art Director Mitch Gordon are joining DDB Needham Worldwide, Chicago. There they will work with former staffers of Riney's Chicago office—Ron Hawkins, senior VP-group creative director, and Bob Taylor, senior VP-creative director and executive art director.

Mr. Gier, 29, whose new title is associate creative director-writer, and Mr. Gordon, 30, associate creative director-art director, will work on DDB Needham's Audi of America account.

At least 10 other executives have left Riney in the past eight months, including another Saturn creative team in January.

"Those things happen," said Thomas Shaver, director of marketing services at the General Motors Corp. unit. "We're still confident, excited and enthusiastic that we're going to see great advertising [from Riney] this fall," he said. That's when Saturn introduces its first two models.

About 50 to 55 Riney employees work either part or full time on Saturn, which accounts for 20% of the agency's work overall.

Last month, Mr. Riney said of the earlier defections that he "kind of suggested some people might like to leave," calling them "suggested resignations."

Mr. Riney said of the earlier defections that he "kind of suggested some people might like to leave."

Agency General Manager John Yost attributed churning among agency personnel to the shop's growth.

"We are very much in the process of constructing and building the next evolution in this agency's growth, and you're going to have some fallout," he said.

But Andrew Dijak, a VP-senior art director who left Riney in January to become co-creative group head at Chiat/Day/Mojo, New York, said the dream of doing breakthrough advertising on Saturn is dead.

"I thought I could do something revolutionary" on the Saturn account, he said. "I personally thought there was an opportunity to do some fresh, distinct advertising that talked directly to the consumer.

"But the only way to do that is to alienate yourself from GM. That's hard to do."

Mr. Dijak said the first Saturn model "is a great car for the money, from the engineering standpoint. But from the standpoint of design, it's a parity product."

He said it's a "shame" that GM "gave the styling over to the same group that does trucks, when there should have been an autonomous studio apart from Detroit. Detroit is still living in the Stone Age."

Bernie Vangrin, a former senior art director at Riney who's now a group creative director at Ketchum Advertising, Pittsburgh, said Mr. Riney's heavy involvement in the business tends to drive some people away.

"That's the way he is. He gets

Cable crossroads

Wild expansion past, roping in viewers becomes key

By Steve Weinstein

Whatever the measurement standard, cable is a success as a new medium, but it faces some rough going in the '90s.

Although cable penetration has reached a respectable 57.1%, a full one-third of homes passed have declined to subscribe. "The truck chasers are all signed up," says John Wolfe, director of public information for the National Cable Television Association. "Now the industry has to go out for people who chose not to subscribe. That's a harder sell."

Also, churn—the rate of subscribers who disconnect the services—remains about 25% a year. Although many disconnects are attributable to the estimated 20% of U.S. families that change residences annually, pay cable faces an annual rate of twice that amount. One agency media buyer predicts pay services eventually will have to turn to advertising to offset promotional expenses caused by churn.

Cable's ratings present another set of problems. Total cable advertising revenue rose to more than $2 billion in 1989 from only $125 million eight years ago. But the Cabletelevision Advertising Bureau hopes to double that amount by 1994. The only way to achieve that goal is to significantly boost ratings.

Within the cable universe, ratings show more improvement than when translated to a national share rating.

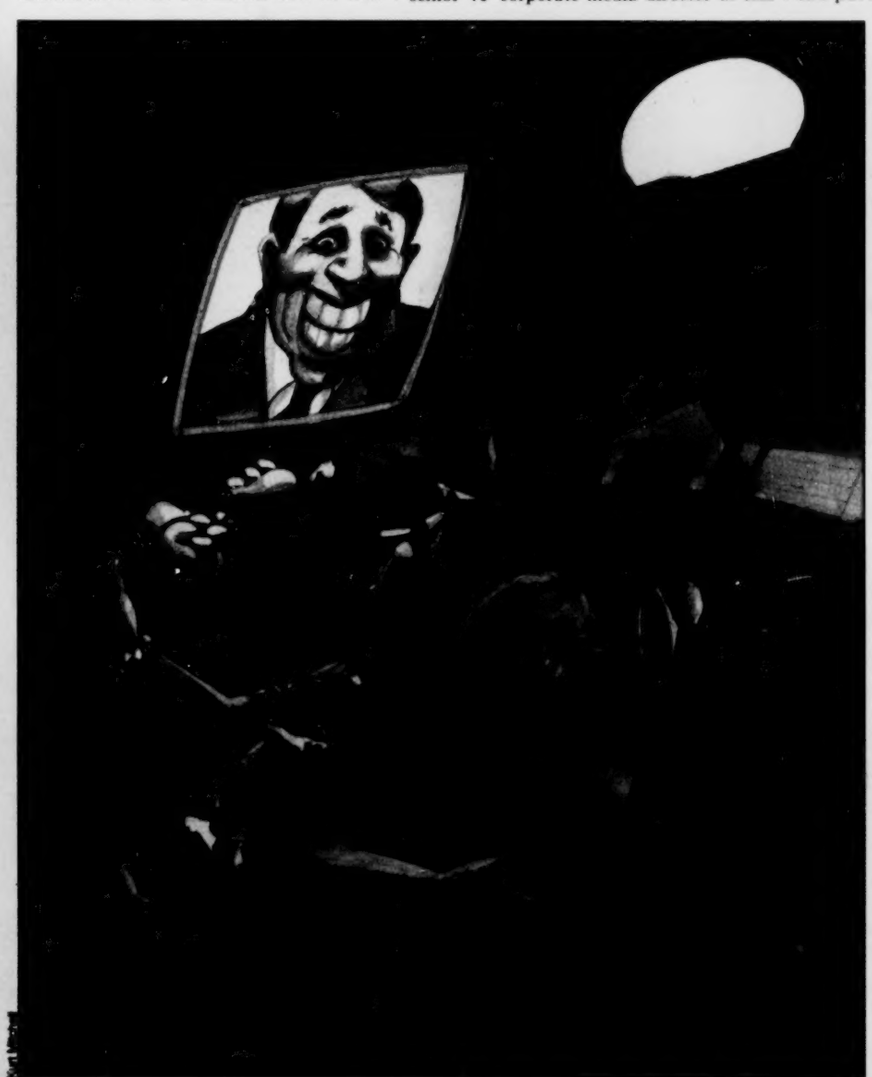
"Cable people want us to look at ratings within their universe," says David Verklin, senior VP-corporate media director at Hal Riney & Partners in San Francisco. "We tend to be more focused on national equivalent ratings, to compare apples to apples," he says.

According to Mr. Verklin, now that ratings are equaling the low end of broadcast network programs, cable competition for ad budgets is entering a "new phase."

"As part of the buying process, the networks package together some more and less expensive shows," says Mr. Verklin. "You don't get the leverage when using cable, a low-rated packaging device." Cable thus becomes a less efficient medium than broadcast, he feels.

The resistance to include cable in the mix of media buys extends to other agencies.

"Does it make more sense to do cable or does it make more sense to take that money and put it in spot TV? If you were to buy a station in a large market, you might actually get more impressions out of it [the large market station]. . . . The small ratings do impact. That's one of the reasons why we will not pay network prices for cable or even syndication prices for cable," says Jon Mandel, senior VP-national broadcast, Grey Advertising, New York.



Cable viewing remains on the upswing relative to broadcast, being the only program source that is increasing viewership, up 15% the first two months of this year. Most of this increase is attributed to big-budget programming, especially original movies, documentaries, concerts and major-league sports.

"We see tremendous efforts by cable networks to put programming on the air that's going to work," says Peggy Green, exec VP-director of broadcast media buying at Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising in New York.

But big-ticket programs need a big-budget revenue stream, and cable still offers lower costs per thousand.

The most obvious solution to these dilemmas is increased cable promotions. But the industry has to reorient its promotions from sign-up to tune-in.

"It has not been the basic skill of the cable industry over the years," says CAB President Robert Alter.

"They were always doing a bundle of programs and letting the public sort them out."

"Basic cable begins as a delivery system and ends up as a programming alternative," says Mr. Verklin. "It's an efficient way to deliver the TV signal, but the rates being charged in some ways are causing churn."

"Over the next six months you'll see a more aggressive posture to get our message across,"

SELLING THE NATIONAL PASTIME

When the owners and players resolved baseball's labor dispute in the wee morning hours of March 19, executives at ESPN breathed a collective sigh of relief. Audibly.

Before the agreement, those at the cable sports network could only wait and wonder if its unprecedented $400 million, four-year pact to televise up to 175 Major League Baseball games each year would become folly.

But as the clock ticked toward today's originally scheduled opening day, officials at ESPN refused to panic, publicly confident the season would never be canceled.

"I'm generally an optimist," Steve Bornstein, ESPN's exec VP of programming and production, told the press the day after the baseball agreement. "But I guess in the darkest of nights I wondered if this thing was ever going to get settled."

Although ESPN lost the chance to televise several scheduled preseason games, Mr. Bornstein says the network will air at least 161 regular-season games as originally planned and as many games as possible during the abbreviated spring training.

As a veteran of sports labor disputes—National Football League players went on strike in 1987 but resolved the issues before any of ESPN's regular-season telecasts were canceled—the network was prepared to move at a moment's notice.

In fact ESPN, in the middle of the 32-day lockout, acted as if all would be resolved, signing on Feb. 28 the last announcers needed to broadcast its Sunday and Wednesday night games and Tuesday and Friday doubleheaders.

As spring training games were canceled, however, each ESPN department had its own problems to keep the network's programming coup from turning into an albatross.

"I'd be an absolute fool to say the lockout didn't affect us," says Jack Bonanni, senior VP-advertising sales for ESPN. "It definitely had an impact. There were no positives from an advertiser standpoint. We sold baseball to people. All we could do during the lockout was try to make it worth their while to stay with us with or without baseball."

Mr. Bonanni started pitching baseball to advertisers as the ink was drying on the network's contract signed with Major League Baseball on Jan. 5, 1989.

Before any games were threatened to be canceled or delayed, Mr. Bonanni says about 50% of the network's total ad inventory in the scheduled 171 games (including 10 preseason contests) was sold. But in February and March, the lockout cast a pall over further sales efforts.

"The problems became more serious with those hesitant to commit to baseball, because no one knew what was going to happen or when any games would be played. Advertisers need ratings points when they want them. If they couldn't wait for baseball, they had to consider alternative media," he says.

Once the owners and players salvaged most of the regular season and spring training facilities opened, more advertisers were ready to talk.

"Now that advertisers know the lockout is over, there's a lot of activity," Mr. Bonanni says. "We've had quite a few calls."

Mr. Bonanni says 64 marketers either signed before or during the lockout to advertise during ESPN baseball coverage. Most, he adds, were "understanding" during the labor dispute, allowing the network to shift time from canceled games to later in the season or even accepting deals to advertise in replacement programs.

"Our job was to keep as many advertisers with ESPN without baseball," Mr. Bonanni says. "If baseball would give them a 2.0 rating, we would give them 3.0 rating points in our alternatives."

Advertisers such as Sears, Roebuck & Co. and Mitsubishi, two of the first companies to sponsor ESPN's baseball telecasts, continued to call to find out what the network planned instead of baseball.

"We told them we expect the season to start sometime, and if there is a delay, we will work with the advertiser within their parameters," he says.

Although ESPN did not have a role in the dispute, the network could be hurt as an "innocent bystander" if baseball fans revolt by not watching or attending games when the season begins.

If baseball TV ratings suffer, it could force the network to give advertisers make-good units and reduce its baseball ad revenue, a scenario those at the network hope to avoid.

> "No one knew what was going to happen. . . . Advertisers need ratings points when they want them. If they couldn't wait for baseball, they had to consider alternative media."

"A lot of fans were aggravated," says Bill Ketcham, ESPN's senior VP-marketing, whose task now is to remind viewers the cable network has baseball this season. "On one hand there might be a baseball-starved audience, but there will also be a baseball-pissed audience, and we have to overcome that."

To launch its baseball coverage, ESPN initially set aside a $16 million promotional budget, including the value of on-air spots. But the momentum the network hoped to create leading up to its first regular-season telecast was doused by the lockout.

Mr. Ketcham had hoped to use the March 15 and 16 telecasts of first-round National Collegiate Athletic Association basketball tournament games to hype baseball, but then canceled the promotional plans when the dispute dragged on.

"The only good news is that there is three weeks of training before the start of the regular season," he says. "That gives us three weeks to get into TV Guide, absolutely get into newspapers and add baseball games to our Sports Illustrated 'ESPN Sports Week' ad."

As scheduled spring training telecasts were canceled, Mr. Ketcham canceled most of the network's print advertising. Some ads still appeared in monthly magazines with long lead times such as Playboy.

But one saving element, he says, is that the ads in monthlies used the network's umbrella theme, "If it happens in baseball, you'll see it on ESPN," instead of promoting specific games.

In late January, Charlie Chaplin-themed promotional spots on ESPN detailed coverage of Wednesday and Sunday night games and doubleheaders on Tuesday and Friday along with the creation of its new seven-day in-studio show called "Baseball Tonight."

"We were trying to drill those things into people's heads and then, once the season started, be out there on the air and heavy in newspapers and magazines. Now I'm hoping the bulk of spending, which we've shifted to April, will be enough to regain lost momentum.

"We bit our nails until closing dates in March on a lot of newspapers and magazines and then had to say we were sorry," he says.

"Baseball Tonight," ESPN's nightly baseball show, coincidentally premiered the night after the lockout ended.

Instead of being forced to use the lockout in the same fashion the Iranian hostage crisis helped launch ABC's "Nightline," ESPN's show was able to give viewers breaking news about the upcoming season.

Mr. Bornstein, the head of programming and production, downplayed the juggling act he performed to fill gaping holes left by canceled preseason games and then refit baseball into the March and April schedule.

With the settlement coming on March 19, opening day was moved back to April 9. ESPN quickly scheduled telecasts of preseason games on March 26, 27 and 29 but had to wait for Major League Baseball to figure out its scheduling plan before the network could determine specific opening day and first-week coverage.

Once games were scheduled, Mr. Ketcham quickly snapped up space for tune-in ads in The Sporting News, The National, TV Guide and more to tout early season games.

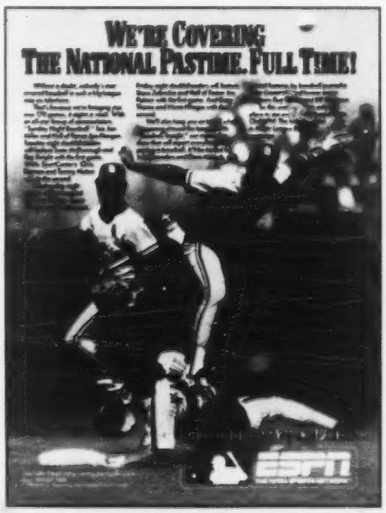
Time was also set aside for game-specific on-air promotions to let ESPN viewers know when and where they could find baseball telecasts.

Baseball, Mr. Bornstein says, was always considered "additive" to the ESPN schedule, meaning other sports, either live or on tape delay, could replace canceled games or be shifted to make room for newly scheduled games.

"With baseball, we expand our day," he says. "We do it by adjusting."

The production crews and announcers were always on stand-by during the lockout, waiting for word about when and where once the settlement was reached.

"We made a commitment," Mr. Bornstein says. "If we had lost a month of games, there would be some concerns [about production quality]. But people have been here 14 months working on nothing but baseball. We're ready to go." □



McCann-Erickson advertising, themed "If it happens in baseball, you'll see it on ESPN," had more than one meaning during the lockout.

Cable fears federal shackles

Anxious operators to plead their case against re-regulation

By Steven W. Colford

SELLING CONGRESS

The next few weeks will tip whether the federal government will return with a vengeance to police cable TV or merely fine-tune it.

The cable industry believes only the latter is necessary for an industry that has grown from 15 million subscribers in 1980 to 53 million at the end of 1989.

But that growth has not been smooth, and it's the bumps in the road that have Congress and the Federal Communications Commission pondering varying degrees of regulation.

In its anxiety to grow, the industry ignored two basics for any customer service—price and quality—and now may be paying the re-regulatory price.

"We built 830,000 miles of system in 10 years," says Decker Anstrom, exec VP of the National Cable Television Association. "Sure, there've been growing pains. But we also haven't done a good job telling our story; for about $15 a month, consumers can receive about 30 channels, which is a tremendous deal."

The most comprehensive regulatory threat for the cable industry to consider comes from the staff of the Senate Commerce Committee, which last month held a hearing on a March 8 staff draft that combined into a single proposal most of the re-regulatory changes advocated by various lawmakers.

The draft's release was not a hit with the NCTA.

Mr. Anstrom, repeating the reaction of NCTA President Jim Mooney, found little encouragement in the 37-page draft. "There is very little in there that the cable industry could support," he says. "It goes far beyond what the record would call for. And the Senate already has made clear that there is ample room for discussion, and we will pursue that."

After the committee's second hearing this week on final legislation patterned after the staff draft, a major push is expected for a quick committee vote, says a committee aide. But whatever changes to the bill occur after the two public hearings, rate re-regulation is likely to remain at the heart of the bill that ultimately faces a full committee vote. "The bill would be nothing without that," an aide says.

With the backing of two key senators, a cable re-regulation bill would appear likely to emerge from committee and, according to the aide, be ready for a full Senate vote before July 2. "With the Senate leadership behind it, that significantly improves chances of its passage," the aide says.

One of the draft's most objectionable provisions, according to the NCTA, is the intent to regain the power to regulate rates.

"That simply goes way too far," says Mr. Anstrom, noting that cable rates in 1989 grew 3.8%, according to the Bureau of Labor Statistics, compared with a 4.6% rise in the consumer price index. A General Accounting Office report on cable rate hikes through 1989 is due for release in June, Mr. Anstrom says. The FCC in July is scheduled to furnish its five-year report on cable deregulation.

"Cable is attractive to advertisers today because [rate] deregulation allowed investment in cable networks that appeal to a niche audience," he says. "Re-regulation of rates will make those networks less attractive.

"Cable spending on programming has grown from $300 million in 1984 to $1 billion in 1989," he says. "Programming expenditures will continue to grow in order to attract new subscribers, but if rates are re-regulated and networks can't make that investment, the level of subscribers will 'top off' at a level well below what it otherwise would have."

Another aspect of the Senate draft bill requires local cable systems to carry a minimum number of broadcast channels; for any system exceeding 30 cable channels, the minimum would be 10.

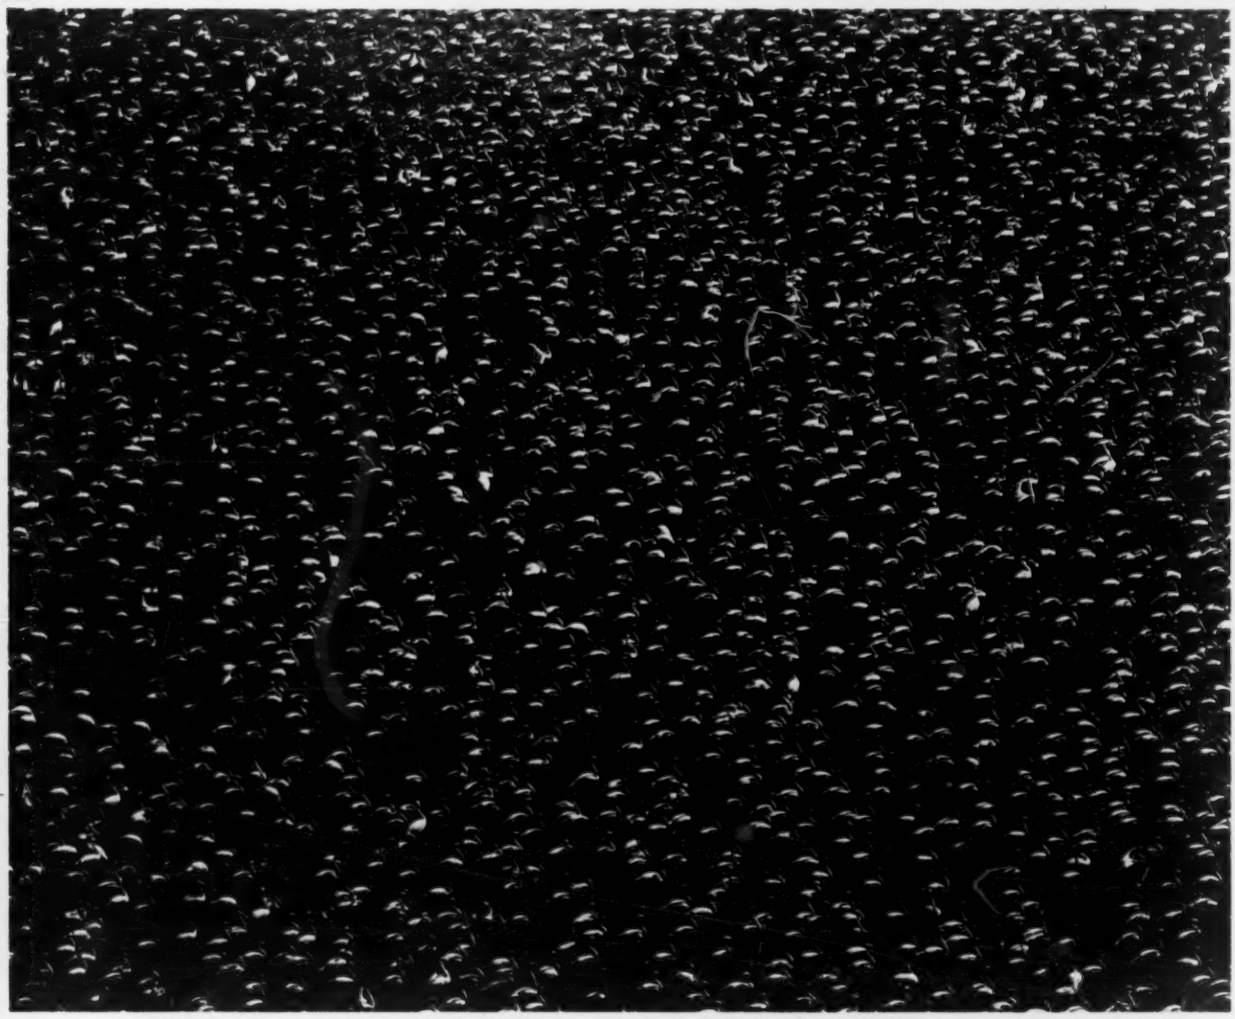
That steep a requirement, Mr. Anstrom says, is another example of "overreaching" by lawmakers that would come back to harm consumers and advertisers.

The Senate draft also would require certain broadcast channels carried by cable systems to receive preferred positioning on the cable converter; a local channel 9, for example, would be positioned in the 9 slot on the converter, with the cable channel that might previously have occupied that position being bumped to a higher, less preferred, location.

NCTA balks at the positioning requirement. It also opposes a National Association of Broadcasters idea for cable systems to pay local broadcasters for their retransmission. "I think there's very little sentiment in Congress to impose, as CBS proposed, a requirement that we pay an amount" to a CBS affiliate, Mr. Anstrom claims.

The next few weeks will witness an "intense dialogue among cable and broadcast representatives, Senate leaders and staff" to try to resolve the impasse over re-regulation proposals, Mr. Anstrom says. "Nothing even approaching what's in that draft will appear in [ultimate] legislation," Mr. Anstrom vowed. "There may be some fine-tuning, but nothing more."

In light of the outspokenness of cable's legislative nemeses—including such powerhouses as Sen. Ernest Hollings (D., S.C.) and John Danforth (R., Mo.)—that remains to be seen. □



49 MILLION AMERICAN HOMES INCLUDE DISCOVERY™ IN THEIR PLANS. YOU SHOULD, TOO.

Audiences have made Discovery™ the fastest-growing network among the top ten. In fact, they've made us the fastest-growing basic cable network in history for three years in a row.

Discovery has become an essential part of most media plans. Available in 49 million American homes. Nearly 90% of all cable homes. 53% of all TV households*.

We're just 7 points behind cable's leader. And with our phenomenal growth rate, it won't take us long to catch up.

So if you've planned to put cable in your buy, put Discovery at the top of your list. Because in a matter of months that's probably where we'll be.

Radio spots emphatic: It's not what you think

MTV takes its irreverence to new airwaves

By Wayne Walley

The spot sounds like something you've heard before: "This is a test. For the next 60 seconds, this is a test." But then it goes a bit awry: "We don't know what we're testing or why. For the next 60 seconds you will undergo a test. You do not need a pencil ... all you need to know is this is a test."

Entitled "Test," the spot is part of an MTV: Music Television multimillion-dollar campaign, which plays off the network's well-known irreverent attitude toward other media.

"We play on things people normally hear on the radio and twist it, MTV-style," says Harriet Seitler, senior VP-marketing and promotion, MTV: Music Television.

The spots use the theme, "Just when you think you know what it is, it's MTV: Music Television," and parody such things as emergency announcements, traffic reports, announcer-training school ads and political commercials.

"You can use radio effectively with limited money. So we go in screaming."

The commercials, created by MTV and its agency, Fred/Alan, New York, end with the theme line followed by a tune-in announcement telling listeners to "Watch MTV on cable TV" or "Watch the new lineup of comedy weeknights at 7:00 only on MTV" or "Don't miss MTV in the morning. Watch 'Awake on the Wild Side,' the new MTV morning show weekdays on MTV."

"We're doing 'not normal' radio to enforce the idea that we're 'not normal' television," Ms. Seitler says. "The real intent is to give listeners an idea of what MTV is about, that it's the channel to be at. It will raise your eyebrows and you understand what you will get."

The network used radio last year and found an increase in cumulative viewing of MTV in markets using radio alone or in conjunction with print and TV advertising, as opposed to markets where radio was not used, says Ms. Seitler.

"The more advertising we did, the more the increase in cume. You can use radio effectively with limited money. So with the economy of the medium, we go in screaming. That's what we're doing this year, with a heavy and long playlist on the stations we're using," she says.

The campaign will run through mid-April; a second flight will run in the third quarter.

The next step, says Ms. Seitler, will be adapting the campaign theme to print and TV.

"We're exploring a campaign with different artists, asking them to express in their own vision, 'Just when you think you know what it is, it's MTV.' We want to do a series in print, and we expect to create a version of some form for on-the-air advertising," she says. □

Hard sell

Mr. Alter predicts. "It's been discussed at all the cable industry meetings. But this has not been part of mainstream cable efforts. It was not built in as part of the overall marketing approach."

As a new technology, cable has spent so much time promoting new subscribers that tune-in promotion has historically been given short shrift.

"Five years ago, 100% of promotion was acquisition," Mr. Alter says. "Now there's a much higher percentage of audience promotion."

But the industry has a lot of catching up to do. The average independent broadcast station's promotion staff numbers 3.5 people; by contrast, only a few cable systems even have a promotion department.

Cable Television Administration & Marketing Society has set up a Program Promotion Committee that is planning a new major attitude usage study due in the fall.

That's the kind of effect advertisers can get with the combination of TBS and TNT. Because each of them, in a distinctly different way, offers programming that appeals to every demographic group.

With the TBS/TNT combination, advertisers get the program variety to build a vertical program strategy, and make a direct hit on their demographic target. Or rather, two direct hits.

"The network has only one line of programming," Mr. Alter says. "A local system has 36 channels to promote."

Cable networks are now concentrating on tie-in promotions with local operators and multiple system operators. Each month the CAB mails out a hefty Cable Tune-In Kit that contains radio spots, promotion ideas and a planning calendar that features a different network program to be promoted each day.

It's all part of a master plan to try to coordinate local promotion plans with the networks, instead of haphazard campaigns. "Unlike CBS, NBC and ABC, our networks cooperate," Ms. Durborow says.

"It's interesting cable gets as good a viewership as it does with the little bit of viewership promotion that's done," says Terry Rich, VP-sales and marketing at Heritage Communications, a Des Moines, Iowa-based MSO. "What we as operators have to do is know how to pick a program." Mr. Rich and other MSO executives are working with CAB to organize local promotions.

Operators not only have to encourage tune-in but defend themselves from regulatory agencies angered at rate increases and customer service problems. "The smart systems are running local image-building campaigns," says Les Luchter, editor of Cable Marketing. "Cable recognizes its image is lousy."

Manhattan Cable, for example, has "Comin' through for you," a cross-network print and broadcast image-building campaign. Heritage uses broadcast, radio and newspaper as well as cable and bill inserts for its "The choice to come home to" theme.

Other MSOs are beginning to take up local causes, encouraged by Cable Television Public Affairs. The Cable Alliance for Education, which began as an anti-Whittle measure, offers CNN Newsroom and ad-free classroom programming on some networks in the morning. It also provides cable gratis to local schools. "Bravo for Books," a classroom promotion chaired by first lady Barbara Bush, is sponsoring a nationwide competition of high school theatrical productions.

American Movie Classics has designed four different turn-key programs for children, adults, mature adults and VIPs that local affiliates can implement in their communities.

If such programs help local operators improve their image, operators and networks hope that they will also increase audience awareness of cable programming.

"There's an intense movement among cable operators to upgrade their whole tune-in and promotional effort," says Larry Gerbrandt, senior analyst for Paul Kagan & Associates. Networks are downloading commercials into unsold local avails for cross-network promotion. "It's much more sophisticated than before," he says. □

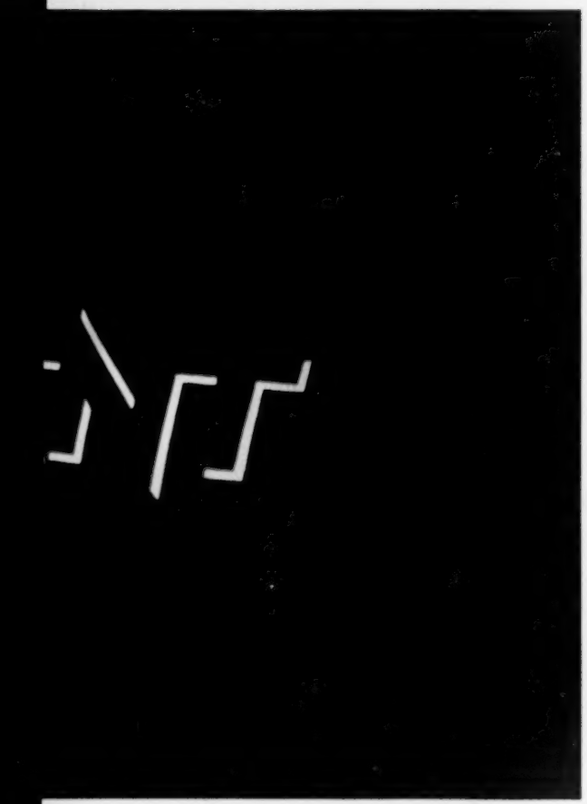
ON PUNCH



TNT GETS THE HIGHEST RATINGS IN HOLLYWOOD.

TNT has set new standards for cable television across the board: ratings, programming quality, originality and star quality.

In Hollywood, they really love us. Because TNT is producing scripts other networks are afraid of, with the kind of roles actors would kill for.

These prestigious monthly premieres continue, with productions like "The Rose and the Jackal" with Christopher Reeve; Kathleen Turner in a Myrna Loy retrospective; and Isabella Rosellini and John Lithgow in "The Ivory Hunters."

TNT is already famous, too, for its innovative scheduling of classic movies, all restored to pristine condition.

REACH YOUR FAMILIES WITH OUR FAMILY.

No other networks, cable or broadcast, can match the combined punch of TBS and TNT. Because individually, both networks have the variety and the programs that bring the whole family to the set.

And together, they give advertisers real knockout power.

ment, TBS will present a number of important new specials, like the Cousteau Society's "Outrage at Valdez," "Arctic Refuge" with Meryl Streep and "Voice of the Planet," a 10-hour original production.

Of course, all the things that have always made TBS the number one choice of American viewers will continue: professional and amateur sports, popular movies, great kids' shows and proven comedy favorites.

Time Warner leads trend buys across media

By Debbie Harrod

CROSS-SELLING: MULTI-MEDIA BUYS

It could be the ultimate in one-stop media shopping with one call, one order, agency buyers could buy into an array of media ranging from magazines to entertainment events to TV.

While a number of media conglomerates are working on such packages, few offer the ability to create such a service as does the recently merged Time Warner. Its stable of powerhouse magazine titles, cable systems and programming service offers both the ability to reach substantial numbers of prospects and to target specific geographic markets and demographic segments.

Agency media buyers clearly are interested.

"The idea would be to add pieces together for a total package that would be cheaper than buying separate pieces, plus have a synergy that builds a value beyond," says Allen Banks, media director of Saatchi & Saatchi Co., New York.

Although Time Warner executives say they still are in the early stages of assessing how they can mix and match their media properties in ad packages and cross-promote each other's media vehicles, some early steps indicate what the future may hold.

The easiest moves are being made first. For example, those looking to buy time on any of five New York metro cable systems now run by Time Warner are among the first to see the synergies of the media conglomerate play out.

In February, the systems consolidated their local ad sales forces, creating for the first time a one-stop buy for advertisers that wish to be on any or all of the com-

No sale without efficiency

New operations like NBC's still need attractive pricing

By Wayne Walley

CROSS-SELLING: CABLE & BROADCAST

At this time last year the major broadcast networks were saying some nasty things about cable. CBS had circulated a report entitled "The Cable Fable," pointing out to advertisers and agencies what it considered cable's shortcomings. ABC had created a presentation entitled "20 Questions Facing National TV Advertisers," which subtly raised similar concerns.

NBC, at the time on the verge of launching cable service Consumer News & Business Channel, was a bit less verbal, although its salespeople were on the street talking up network TV's comparative strengths following the February sweeps.

What a difference a year makes.

Now, NBC's network sales and marketing division oversees ad sales for CNBC and SportsChannel America—co-owned by NBC and Cablevision Systems—and cross-media cooperation could conceivably become the wave of the future as advertisers look for package buys that incorporate more than one medium.

"When a large media company has multimedia divisions, the pairings are obvious, and it makes sense to set up cross-media deals," says Betsy Frank, senior VP-director of TV information and new media for Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising, New York.

"But it only makes sense if the buy is more efficient," she says. "They have to prove to us through discounting or value-added opportunities that we're better off giving more dollars to General Electric and getting on NBC with CNBC instead of NBC and a consumer segment on Financial News Network."

Already, Miller Brewing Co., North American Philips Corp. and Universal Pictures have taken advantage of the offer and bought special broadcast/cable ad packages.

Capital Cities/ABC, which owns both the ABC-TV network and cable's ESPN, has yet to combine sales efforts. But the company could be forced to consider creating similar cross-media packages to keep up with the competition.

"Cable Fable" author CBS does not own any cable properties but is selling the ad time within the Olympic programming the network sold to Turner Broadcasting Systems' TNT.

"All the rules we thought we knew no longer exist," Ms. Frank says.

Bob Blackmore, NBC's exec VP of sales, says the structure of a new sales department should take shape this month and put NBC in position for any marketplace changes in the coming decade. "You have to know all areas. The more you know about other media, the better," he says.

"By combining network with cable, you can also give reach with targeted and pinpointed demographics," he adds. "It all depends on the media needs of the client. This way we make sure they have enough choice."

Some clients, he says, probably won't take advantage of the combination, preferring to keep broadcast and cable separate. But the network might fold in inventory from SportsChannel America as part of a "sports daypart" it offers to advertisers.

Art Miller, CNBC's senior VP of sales, says CNBC is still selling time separately. But the clout of NBC, he says, gives CNBC more resources and ways to convince advertisers they are a better buy than the competition.

"We're still feeling our way," he says. "But we can target and do special tie-ins NBC advertisers might want to try but can't do on the network.

"This opens the door to so many more clients for us," he says. □

'Cross-promotion to create a buzz'

Starting channel? Build awareness via current fare

By Edmond Rosenthal

CROSS-SELLING: SISTER NETWORKS

Intensive cross-promotion for eight weeks on sister networks MTV, VH-1 and Nickelodeon/Nick at Nite, preceded the April 1 launch of Ha! TV Comedy Network.

"The cross-promotion campaign for Ha! has been running for about a month—with a different spot each week—on all three networks," says Leslye Schaefer, VP-marketing for Ha! TV Comedy Network.

There is $1 million in inventory set aside for this campaign in 1990, she says. "After the launch we will continue to promote it [Ha!] on our other networks, not only because of the reach, but because their visual and creative environment will mirror what Ha! will look like.

"It's a real cornerstone for our promotion plan," Ms. Schaefer says. "We've been getting calls from affiliates and viewers that show there is a real awareness created by our promotions.

"This cross-promotion has been done to create a buzz, and things are buzzing," she says. Ha! is spending an additional $6 million this year in consumer and trade promotion, print and TV.

Cross-promotion is the most effective form of promotion any of the networks can get, says Steve Seidmon, MTV VP-programming.

Turner Broadcasting System's VP-On-Air Promotion Jeff Grimshaw agrees. It wasn't long ago that Turner launched TNT with heavy promotion on its network channels. Not only did this help establish the new entity, he says, but it was perhaps the best indicator anyone has of the effectiveness of routine cross promotion.

"When TNT was launched [with heavy promotion on Super Station WTBS, CNN and Headline News], it took up the lion's share of all on-air promotion, so the other networks weren't getting as much as they had been. As a result, we saw a definite dip in viewing. That's the strongest argument I've seen for cross-promotion," says Mr. Grimshaw.

Turner's routine cross-promo-pany's systems serving Manhattan, Queens or a portion of Brooklyn, says Richard Aurelio, president, Time Warner New York City Cable Group. Advertisers previously had to go to each of the five systems to buy time.

"In cable, New York City is one group that is actually merged," he says. "What we're doing here is being watched closely by both parents."

Mr. Aurelio says a number of other ideas are in the works but not announced, a situation executives throughout Time Warner media properties confirmed.

"Everything is possible," says Mr. Aurelio. With all of Time Warner's entertainment, music, movie and cable properties, it's "easy to find synergies. We'll do the more obvious things first," he adds, such as consolidate all customer-service operations and offer common channel lineups.

Cross-promotion includes, for example, special discount subscription forms for Time Warner's new Entertainment Weekly appearing in New York City Cable Group subscribers' bills.

Tony Adams, manager of national accounts, Warner Cable Communications, says Time magazine group always has been a big cable direct-response advertiser, but the merger has made it "a lot easier to get in the doors."

"With the signing of the merger," says Comedy Channel VP-National Sales Manager David McCoy, "getting pieces of Warner involved is just taking off." He sees the greatest opportunities in ad packages involving Warner's studio, its syndication properties, Comedy Channel and Time Warner magazines.

An upcoming project that crosses several of Time Warner's media groups is a 16-page "user's guide to comedy," an advertising supplement that will run in People and Entertainment Weekly, says Larry Divney, the channel's senior VP-advertising sales.

Advertisers are being offered a page in the ad supplement in both magazines, spots on the Comedy Channel, sponsorships and outdoor board placements, Mr. Divney says. He calls the campaign the most simple of planned projects, adding, "There are a lot of conversations still taking place," regarding other projects.

Mr. Divney says one roadblock may result from what he calls the "structural obstacle" of media placements being handled by separate agency groups.

"In companies that have outdoor, magazines, newspapers, broadcast, you've got to have somebody who can put those things together," says Joe Ostrow, exec VP-worldwide media director, Foote, Cone & Belding, New York.

He says FCB is carefully analyzing the opportunities, and sees two ways Time Warner could approach its situation.

The first, Mr. Ostrow says, is "a total volume deal for all areas of media." But he asks, "Are they prepared to put cable, programming, magazines together in one piece?"

The other option would be an individual buy. "If a client buys a lot of magazine [space], we might look for some [synergy] on a cable outlet. Not just a channel but, depending on how the experiment in Rochester [N.Y.] works, with national support from magazines and this form of local TV," he says.

Mr. Ostrow is referring to American Television & Communications Corp.'s Greater Rochester Cablevision, which early this year launched WGRC-TV, a cable channel that mimics an independent broadcast TV station (AA, Dec. 11).

"[That channel] is going to marry about a half-dozen different things," he says. "They're breaking through walls within that corporation as never before."

John Orr, WGRC general manager, says he'd be all for cross-media ads if his Area of Dominant Influence matched that of the regional editions of any Time Warner magazines.

Another area Time Warner can exploit is event marketing, says Tom Winner, exec VP-director media operations, Campbell-Mithun-Esty, New York. Time Warner will look for sponsorships for certain concerts, he says, adding, "Hopefully they'll include Warner artists and some HBO property."

Such sponsorships could run the gamut of Time Warner properties—magazines, TV, books—and perhaps even extend to areas such as educational programs. In that scenario, speculates Mr. Winner, Time Warner could produce a TV show or series of vignettes, cassettes for educators and booklet distribution as well.

But, he says, there may be too much of a good thing. "The problem as I see it, is that [such a large package] becomes cost-prohibitive for all but a few." Mr. Winner suggests, as did other media buyers, that Time Warner create an array of packages that would be "palatable to many."

Mr. Banks sees a benefit in the operation's immense reach, however, offering global possibilities in addition to domestic packages.

"The bottom line is will you save money as a package?" says Bart McHugh, senior VP-director of national radio and TV programming, DDB Needham Worldwide, New York.

He says he likes the pluses of dealing with a company that can provide cable and other media. But Mr. McHugh adds one caveat: "If it doesn't work for the client, we will walk away." □

tion is to give the two entertainment channels—TBS and TNT—one minute each an hour for promotion, and the news networks, 50 seconds each an hour. Of that time, 70% goes to the host network and 30% is split evenly among the other three services.

According to trade estimates, Turner's promotion time is worth about $50 million annually.

That promotion time is "obviously a tremendous advantage," says Andy Besch, senior VP-marketing, USA Network. "If you put yourself in the mode of the viewer, you can see Turner promote a movie on four networks—you can't get away from it."

"It forces me to spend money on local cable that I wouldn't ordinarily have to spend," he adds.

USA Network's annual expenditure for advertising is in six figures, he says. "I can't get on any of the other cable networks any more than I would want them on my air," Mr. Besch says.

While the cable networks can't use other cable nets for their advertising, at the system level, many operators will promote one cable network on the local time of a competing network.

"We cross-promote programs ourselves on comparative services using our local avails," says Charles Ward, VP-national marketing and programming, Times Mirror Cable Television.

There is talk at TBS about redesigning the allocation system based on gross rating points rather than number of spots, says Mr. Grimshaw.

For example, a single spot on WTBS will yield more audience than one on Headline News, so a system could be set up in which a certain number of Headline News spots are worth one WTBS spot. Under this system, WTBS would give away less promotion time and keep more for itself.

Another consideration, Mr. Grimshaw says, is assigning 50% of all cross-promotion to what, "for lack of a better title," is being called "Turner Network Tonight." This would involve promoting all four networks together, "but we'd still have the WTBS impression on WTBS" to maintain its separate identity.

MTV Networks—MTV, VH-1, Nickelodeon/Nick at Nite—are less formal. The time available varies according to commercial load and the needs of the networks to promote specific events.

Ha! usurped much of the recent inventory with 12 spots a day on each of its sister networks—MTV, VH-1, Nickelodeon/Nick at Nite. "It's difficult to quantify effectiveness," Mr. Seidmon says, "but we know from certain experiences when we've had success."

Although MTV channels don't cross-promote Showtime and The Movie Channel, the subscription pay services of parent company Viacom Entertainment do push music specials on Showtime Event Television, a pay-per-view service.

MTV networks also pay close attention to demographics. For example, two programs that skew older viewers than most of its fare —"Week in Rock" and "Unplugged"—are promoted heavily on VH-1 and Nick at Nite, which have older audiences.

Meanwhile, Home Box Office's The Comedy Channel appeared last Nov. 15 without any promotional buzz. Still, HBO benefited from the programming on the new basic service.

At startup, 20% of all clips from stand-up comedy shows and movies shown on The Comedy Channel came from HBO, says Dick Beahrs, The Comedy Channel's president. While there was no intention to promote HBO, all clips are attributed to their sources.

Over time the proportion of HBO clips will diminish to less than 5%, says Mr. Beahrs. In fact, The Comedy Network has had discussions with HBO rival Showtime about using and attributing some of its comedy material, he says.

"If we put on something that's funny and we're not going overboard to hype the product, it's of benefit to HBO." If HBO wants something more directly promotional, he adds, it can buy advertising spots on the channel.

"Cross-promotion is a double-edged sword," Mr. Beahrs says. "Cable operators are not going to be happy if they see an overabundance of HBO clips. They want to have some program integrity on a comedy service. They don't want a service that just promotes HBO."

Another concern in the relationship with cable operators involves promoting services they don't offer.

"If a system operator is carrying all of these services, it's a benefit, sometimes it's awkward if a system is not carrying the service being promoted, but in our experience and to their credit, they don't go as far as they could [they don't advise subscribers to demand the service]," says Mr. Ward.

Mr. Grimshaw says cross-promotion can be a "passive acquisition device" in pushing a newer service into the cable system. "But we don't say, 'Call your operator.' "

It's more an opportunity than a problem for MTV, says Mr. Seidmon.

"Most cable operators carry all of our services. By making cable subscribers aware of the range of services available, we're promoting cable as a whole." [ ]

News In The Biggest Sense Of The Word.

It's our coverage of news in a broader sense that keeps viewers loyal and tuned in all day long. CNN is not only the network to watch in time of crisis, it's the one to watch anytime.

When it comes to regular reports on the international scene, for example, CNN is unequaled. And we alone offer such frequent and thorough coverage of business and finance, health, travel, science and medicine, fashion, entertainment and sports.

Headline News, for its part, draws on all this and condenses it into thirty-minute briefings, updated every half hour.

As CNN Gets Bigger, The World Gets Smaller.

The Wall Street Journal recently noted, "When world leaders want to talk to each other these days, they call CNN."

To accommodate these world leaders —and the world's viewers—CNN has expanded to 24 bureaus worldwide, and is now viewed in 89 countries.

We've invested heavily in new equipment, including a number of portable satellite uplinks for live coverage.

And an important new investigative unit has been formed. Its staff includes some of the most experienced and respected names in investigative journalism.

The Southern California council urges viewers to "Cable up."

You think it's easy to keep Californians in?

Cable co-op fights region's attractions for viewers' time

By Janice Steinberg

Co-op ad agreements can make or break the lines between cable operators and programming services.

"Many [operator] co-ops basically run campaigns that are directed in a way that sponsoring suppliers dictate, given their position of co-operative funding," says Jerry Maglio, senior VP-marketing and programming for United Artists Cable. "Some just run one pay campaign after another, just to use the funding."

Richard Lyness is executive director of the Southern California Cable Television Marketing Council.

In contrast, says Mr. Maglio, the Southern California Cable Television Marketing Council "spends its own money to realize its own objectives, yet makes program suppliers comfortable with the overall campaign."

The Southern California council is spending $3.2 million on advertising this year, with its major focus on basic cable, says Richard Lyness, the council's executive director.

This oldest and largest cable co-op represents 65 of the 85 cable operators in a region that includes Los Angeles, Orange and Ventura counties and parts of Riverside and San Bernardino counties.

Aggressive advertising has contributed to a significant growth in a notoriously tough market. When the council did its first direct-response TV campaign two years ago, penetration lagged behind much of the country at 41%. After three TV campaigns, penetration increased to 50.4% as of January.

"In this market, we are faced with competition from 19 or 20 off-air stations," says Bill Cullen, senior VP-Southwest division of United Artists Cable systems. "Video stores are on every corner, renting videos for 99¢ to $1.50. Plus we are faced with a wide array of leisure activities that tend to take people away from their televisions. People in L.A. watch an hour and a half less of TV per day than people in the rest of the country."

About 40% of the co-op's $3.2 million 1990 ad budget will go to TV, with $500,000 committed to an April direct-response acquisition campaign, says Mr. Lyness. The 1990 plan represents a 28% increase over last year's budget, and includes two major acquisition campaigns and two campaigns on Spanish-language TV. Asher/Gould is the agency.

Mr. Lyness also plans to spend about $200,000 on a spring value-retention campaign with the message, "I'm glad we've got cable."

"It is our hope that we can move our acquisition efforts more in the direction of stressing the benefits and value of the total cable product, in particular, basic, and then look at a strong, well-organized upgrade to maximize pay acquisition and retention," says Mr. Lyness. □

SELLING-PAY: PRICE VS. IMAGE

HBO and Cinemax are fighting the price-promotion trap with a $38 million consumer ad campaign this year that will pitch programming over cost, says Dan Levinson, HBO's VP-advertising and promotion.

This is the first national campaign of its type, claims Steve Janas, VP-direct marketing at HBO, with an objective of showing the consumer the number of choices in both pay and basic cable.

The campaign and its tagline, "HBO is simply the best," attempts to convey the idea of high-quality programming, says Mr. Levinson.

The 21-week effort, by BBDO Worldwide, New York, is divided into three commercials promoting movies, sports exclusives and comedy. Advertising is running through December on the four broadcast networks—at a cost of $34 million—with basic cable accounting for the other $4 million.

Subscriptions tripled for HBO and Cinemax in the 1987-88 test markets, Mr. Levinson claims.

Still, price discounting is far

Toll-free trap

Catchy numbers still work wonders as lure

By Len Strazewski

SELLING TUNE-INS VS. SELLING SIGN-UPS

Cable executives are confronting the dilemma faced by any marketer with a successful ad campaign: Why stop?

The direct-response campaigns featuring catchy toll-free telephone numbers such as 1-800 CABLEME and 1-800-OKCABLE still produce thousands of calls.

Metro Cable Marketing Co-op, Teaneck, N.J., one of the oldest and most powerful cable advertising co-ops in the country, and the first to run regional advertising with a toll-free number, receives about 2,000 to 3,000 calls a day on its 1-800-OKCABLE telephone lines.

Since the early days, says Jim Higgins, Greater Media corporate director of marketing and a founder of MCMC, "We've learned that we need to do more than just sell cable subscriptions with discounts. We need to increase the value of cable in the eyes of our subscribers.

"As penetration increases," he says, "our marketing efforts must become more sophisticated."

Mr. Higgins would like to see a national toll-free number that can provide leads for regional co-ops and allow subscribers to reconnect—rather than cancel—when moving.

"As the co-ops have matured they are beginning to see the logic of expanding their advertising objectives," says Margaret Durburow, president of the Cable Television Administration & Marketing Society and the founder of a Los Angeles-area co-op.

"People in this [New York/New Jersey] ADI have learned the 1-800 number from the years of acquisition campaigns, and those spots continue to draw new subscriber phone calls even without a special offer," says Susan Styer, executive director of MCMC.

The co-op continues its acquisition campaigns during the April and October flights to attract new residents.

"We still include the 1-800 number in the image spots," Ms. Styer says. The image spots also help retention by cutting down on the traditional churn rate, she says.

"The co-op needs to balance both brand/image and acquisition advertising," says Randall Coleman, president of Twin Cities Cable Consortium and a VP at Continental Cablevision in St. Paul, Minn. "We need to convince people that cable is quality TV worth paying for, and the image advertising helps position cable as good TV," he says.

But new subscribers are still best attracted by the incentives inherent in the acquisition spots such as discounted installation or free trial periods of pay channels, he believes.

Robert Alter, president of the Cabletelevision Advertising Bureau, told a January co-op conference that promotion and image advertising were the hottest in-from over yet. "Price offers increase the connect rate, but they also increase the back-end churn [disconnect] rate," says Nora Ryan, senior VP-marketing at Showtime.

Pay services lose about 50% of price-promotion sign-ups, says Ms. Ryan, but once the early droppers are lost, the remainder perform like other subscribers.

In the normal course of business, pay TV loses 5% of its subscribers each month, Ms. Ryan claims, "so we have to replace 60% of our subscriber base annually just to stay even."

Under this kind of pressure, the pay services are hard pressed to find a more effective means of generating activity than price promotion.

The subscription rate for pay services is at least 50% greater if some kind of price promotion is involved, says Mr. Janas.

"Right now, the industry is re-evaluating the price/value relationship," says Ms. Ryan. "Our campaigns in the future will be more directed to selling the value of the product. We'd like to get out of the discounting mode, but the No. 1 reason for refusal to subscribe is that the price is too high," she says.

To some extent, The Disney Channel has found an alternative to price promotions. The pay service has had some success with free weekend previews in which the cable operator sends the service to all cable subscribers on a clear channel.

Although this approach doesn't have the "buy now" incentive attached to it, says Tom Wzyalek, VP-consumer marketing for The Disney Channel, more than 75% of those who subscribe after a preview do so with the intent of staying on for six months or longer.

Those signed up in price promotions, he says, have a 50% to 60%—or lower—retention rate.

Pay services are increasing offers that make more sense to the serious subscriber.

"We've encouraged multi-month discounts, where the discount may be over a period of six months," says Mr. Wzyalek.

> "Price offers increase the connect rate, but they also increase the back-end churn."

Variations include three months at half price for HBO, Cinemax and Showtime, and a third month free at HBO and Cinemax. The latter, according to Mr. Janas, "gets the most qualified subscriber, but first-month-free always performs best in getting new subscribers."

Some of Showtime's recent major promotions have included non-cable offers such as free movie theater passes and free pizza. Domino's pizza, providing the pizzas in exchange for the publicity, also will promote both Showtime and The Movie Channel on 2.4 million boxtops, Ms. Ryan says. These promotions are usually in conjunction with a price incentive at the local level.

The need for hard statistical data is evident. Mr. Janas hopes to answer that need via the tracking of a promotion that started in January. The six-month study, with 30 cable systems participating, will compare churn rates of first-month-free offers with a range of installation offers.

"I'd be hard pressed to say we want to be in this business of discounting," says Mr. Janas. "In terms of building value for the product, you can run yourself into the ground eventually." □ dustry topics.

"The cable industry is starting to realize that cable is a product no different than Pepsi, Coke or McDonald's," says Mr. Coleman. "It has a brand image that needs to be developed and maintained."

The image spots for TCCC feature "slice of life" vignettes from various cable demographic groups such as children, seniors, young singles and young marrieds that show how cable programming relates to each group. The campaign includes the toll-free number and the tagline, "Cable Television at its best."

However, direct response and the consortium's 1-800-CABLE-TV toll-free number are still important aspects of the campaign, he says. The co-op is continuing its subscriber acquisition campaign.

In Los Angeles, the Southern California Cable Council will continue to emphasize subscriber acquisition and is projecting about 200,000 sign-ups from its 1990 effort, says Executive Director Richard Lyness. But the group also will include image advertising as part of its campaign.

Three cable co-ops in San Francisco, Detroit and Columbus, Ohio, with average $1.5 million media budgets per area, also will be image building with a 60-second spot featuring a variety of cable programming options related to various lifestyles and groups such as Nickelodeon and Discovery for children and Lifetime for women, says co-op manager Jim Cooper, exec VP at Tailford Associates in Toledo, Ohio.

"The toll-free number will still be featured in the spot, but the campaign is clearly more than a subscriber-acquisition special offer," he says.

Also planned is an acquisition campaign offering installation within 24 hours.

"It's important to keep the direct-response aspects featured," says Mr. Cooper, "because people tend to pick up the telephone and call when they see something they like." □

Cable tie-in gets spicier

Pizza Hut establishes presence through link

By Russell Shaw

SELLING PIZZA WITH CABLE

Pizza Hut is about to fill a large order.

Cable programmers and Pizza Hut view their joint marketing effort for this month's observance of National Cable Month as an opportunity to cross-pollinate their loyal constituencies.

The numbers both sides bring to the effort are substantial. Nielsen reports cable penetration as of February 1990 at 57.8% with 53.2 million households. Pizza Hut estimates it serves 50 million customers a month.

Still, no conclusive research exists on the percentage of cable subscribers among Pizza Hut customers.

"Yet we do know that our stores and cable development seem to match very well in specific areas," says Claude Caylor, senior director-field marketing and media services for Pizza Hut.

"There is a heavy concentration of Pizza Hut customers in cable homes," says Frances Laufer, VP-associate media director at BBDO Worldwide, Pizza Hut's New York-based agency.

Pizza Hut will spend more than $7 million in broadcast and cable TV and print advertising on the Cable Month campaign.

A 30-second spot that features a combination of product promotion and National Cable Month information with programming highlights is tagged "TV You Gotta See."

The spots will run on 24 advertiser-supported cable networks.

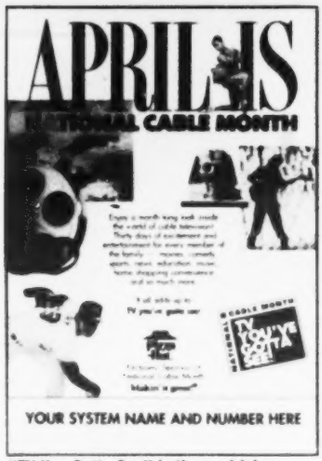
Pizza Hut will feature the National Cable Month schedule in free-standing inserts and on about 20 million placemats. Pizza Hut also will use bill stuffers with pizza discount coupons, focusing on Philadelphia, Atlanta, Albuquerque, N.M., and Rochester, N.Y.

In addition to the Pizza Hut tie-in for National Cable Month, cable operators and regional co-ops in about 80% of U.S. cable TV systems will spend an additional $20 million in promotional advertising.

Media for the campaign includes TV sections of local newspapers, outdoor boards, broadcast networks and local radio.

"More media, more lines, more copy, more advertising and all those tray covers mean we are going to be pretty broadly covered," says Margaret Durborow, president of the Cable Television Administration & Marketing Society.

On nights where pay networks are being highlighted, their signals will be unscrambled so basic viewers can sample the fare.



"TV You Gotta See" is theme driving "cable month" as Pizza Hut hopes viewers sample its fare while watching.

There is no solid research on whether this exposure alone generates new pay subscribers, but promoting pay has become essential as its subscriber levels fall. In 1989, 54.5% of U.S. cable households subscribed to one or more pay services, compared with 57.8% in 1988, according to Paul Kagan Associates.

"It [National Cable Month] is more likely going to drive connects through basic cable and pay will pick up a proportionate share of that," says McAadory Lipscomb, senior VP-corporate affairs and public relations for Showtime Networks.

Showtime's programming will be featured on April 21, including a pitch for two movies and a musical program, "Showtime Coast to Coast All Stars-Special."

The month's programming fare kicked off April 1 with "Night of the Living Gabors" on Nick at Nite/Nickelodeon.

Nickelodeon's involvement with the Pizza Hut National Cable Month promotion comes at the same time the network starts its own $20 million promotional deal with Pizza Hut. The deal calls for Pizza Hut to be a charter advertiser in Nickelodeon magazine, and sponsor Nickelodeon Studios at the Universal Studios theme park in Orlando.

"These are two separate deals, but the synergy is perfect, because National Cable Month occurs right around the time we are kicking off our own Pizza Hut tie-in for spring," says Richard Cronin, senior VP-marketing for Nickelodeon/Nick at Nite. "It gets more exposure to the cable industry, plus our audience and our potential audience are big pizza-eaters."

"On May 1, we want to be heroes and have the cable industry look at Pizza Hut as a real partner," Mr. Caylor says. □

REVIEWING STAND

Cable leaders pick their favorite promotions

Getting audience involved is key

Advertising Age asked cable promotion and marketing executives to name their favorite cable promotions other than their own.

Nick at Nite builds on silliness for commuters to develop tune-ins.

Double Dare takes its frenetic game show on the road to 18 top markets.

CNN Newsroom got involved at the local level to head off resistance.

Rick Busciglio
VP-marketing
The Family Channel

"Nick at Nite's ads are generally lighthearted, and from what I've heard on the street, very successful. They may even be funnier than some of the programs.

"That can be a danger. How far do you go with the adjectives?"

Bo Loverlock
director-marketing and promotions
VH-1

"One goal is to bring promotion events off-channel to schools and malls. Nick at Nite is real successful with bringing the Double Dare Road Show to grammar schools. They're tangibly bringing the channel alive, bringing what they're trying to communicate on the air.

"Promotion is one of the fuels that powers the network."

Bonnie Johnson manager-affiliate marketing
Nickelodeon

"CNN Newsroom is a good promotion just because it's working with schools and education. It boosts cable's image and brings cable into the classroom.

"In addition, Turner assists different schools to get TV sets so it can be viewed, and sends out a program to schools to tell teachers how to use the programming. I think it's really important because it answers more than that greedy need."

Michael Lerner
VP-marketing
The Weather Channel

"The Learning Channel has a nice little package with Converse. They've put together tele-clinics with Magic Johnson as the key spokesperson. That's really nice on-air promotion and something the affiliates can use."

Robin Fisher
director of promotion-Goodwill Games
Turner Broadcasting System

"My favorite promotion was the Corvette givaway on VH-1. That got so much press, and that's what it's all about."

Tom Lucas

"My favorite is the 'I want my MTV' updates. I know it works because I worked there then! It really got an audience animated about getting a new cable channel.

"I can't think of another campaign that ever generated as much awareness. It's advertising that strikes a resonant cord with the audience; people went wild."

PEOPLE TO WATCH

Leslye Schaefer now needs more than one hand to count the cable services she has helped launch over the past 10 years.

Yesterday, she watched No. 6—Ha! TV Comedy Network—blast off.

As the VP-marketing and promotion for MTV Network's Ha! since February, Ms. Schaefer, 38, describes Ha!'s promotional opportunities as being "wide open."

A veteran of MTV Music Television, The Movie Channel, Nickelodeon, Nick at Nite and VH-1, whose promotional activity she still directs, Ms. Schaefer says, "What's really fun about launching a cable channel is establishing a need and proving that it's different. . . . We succeeded very well in differentiating VH-1 and proving there was a need for another . . . video music service.

"That exercise has prepared me pretty well for what needs to be done on Ha!, particularly vis-a-vis the competition and HBO [The Comedy Channel]."

The initial goal of Ha!'s launch has been to communicate to cable operators the network's image: familiar, friendly, relaxing and funny.

A print campaign placed in cable magazines and designed by agency Fred/Alan Inc., New York, directly positions Ha!'s long-form comedy format against HBO's short-form programming. The tagline is "TV comedy that works."

Similar print ad executions are aimed at the entertainment and advertising communities, and consumer campaigns are in the works.

Also, Ms. Schaefer has borrowed a proven pre-launch strategy from Turner Broadcasting System. Use the company's resources. "We've taken advantage of cross-channel opportunites by running spots over eight weeks on MTV, VH-1 and Nickelodeon to promote the fact that Ha! was coming," she says.

Although Ha! has a clearly defined niche, the demographic target audience is broad: the 12-to-54-year-old cable viewer.

Unlike the other MTV services, Ha! targets thematically, not demographically.

"It requires a different kind of thinking, so it's going to be a very interesting challenge. Someone who likes 'Saturday Night Live,' one of our programs, might not particularly care for 'Sergeant Bilko.'

"The important thing is to pick things that are important to your audience," she says.

The VH-1 Corvette Collection Sweepstakes last fall, for example, appealed to the channel's baby-boomer audience with the generation's automotive icon. During the eight-week promotion, more than 2.2 million entries flooded into the channel's office.

Doug Goodman

Leslye Schaefer

Ms. Schaefer attributes her success in the field to having "a passion for the products and so many talented and energetic people."

While creativity is important, she places equal emphasis on managerial skills. "I have a real team style, and I make people feel like they're making a contribution to something important."

"Her personality allows her to bring together a variety of constituencies—the entertainment, advertising and cable trades—who have different objectives," says Robert Friedman, president, Playboy Entertainment Co., and her former boss at MTV Networks. "That's an important quality," he says.

Ms. Schaefer says her ambition is to simply "progress."

But after a moment she reconsiders. "I guess that I do have a goal: I'd love to own a TV station . . . a radio station . . . a cable system."

A WEALTH OF MEN FOR HALF THE PRICE

For half of what it costs to reach affluent, educated men with news and sports, you can reach this highly desirable target on a very desirable network—A&E.

Given the rising cost of sports and the older, average-income profile of news, A&E is a logical alternative. A&E is not only more effective at reaching the right men, it's also more efficient than most news and sports programs. And unlike most networks, A&E's male audience is available seven days a week.

So if you've set your sights on upscale men make sure your plan includes A&E.

A penny saved is a penny spent

By Scott Hume

CHICAGO—Consumers will change their shopping habits and brand preferences to take advantage of promotions, especially those that cut purchase prices or provide rebates.

That's one conclusion from a study on consumer attitudes toward sales promotion tactics, conducted for the Promotion Marketing Association of America by United Marketing Services.

Major findings from the study were presented last month at PMAA's "Update '90" conference.

The survey was conducted by phone in late 1989 among 500 people who said they were the primary shoppers in their household and who had participated in some type of sales promotion.

To make the group nationally projectable, 85% of participants were women. Of the total panel, most (39%) were 35 to 54; 30% were 18 to 34; 31% were 55 or older. In terms of household income, 33% were at less than $25,000; 36% reported $25,000 to $44,999; and 31% were greater than $45,000.

Manufacturers' coupons are the most popular of the four promotions studied, with 98% of respondents saying they had used at least one coupon on a purchase in the previous six months. Rebates were second (54% used them), followed by sweepstakes (26%) and premiums (17%).

Eight of 10 people surveyed (82%) said they regularly check newspaper ads for coupons, and nearly half (47%) said they also look for the other three types of promotional offers.

The survey found that in addition to being the most popular, coupons have the most influence on buying habits and brand switching.

Asked if they ever bought a new product they hadn't tried simply because of a promotional offer, 70% said they had done so because of a coupon offer. Premium offers had enticed 40% of respondents, while 20% had fallen for a sweepstakes offer and 38% had been lured by a rebate.

Coupons also proved to be the most compelling promotional lure for causing consumers to change brands within a product category. Almost three out of four respondents said a coupon had caused them to switch at least once in the previous six months. Half said a rebate had made them fickle, while 40% were enticed by a premium and 20% switched brands for a sweepstakes offer.

And which product categories are most vulnerable to brand switching because of an offer? More than 60% of respondents said batteries.

Brand loyalty also was weak for several other product categories. In coffee, personal appliances, shampoo and toothpaste, more than half said they are likely to switch brands because of promotional offers.

How much trouble will consumers go to for a promotion? That depends on the size of the potential reward, the study found.

For example, 56% of the consumers polled said they'd be willing to send in a single proof of purchase for a $1 rebate, and 38% said they'd go so far as to collect and send multiple proofs. For a $2 rebate the percentages rise to 70% and 52%, respectively. For $5, 86% would send a single proof and 76% would send multiples.

Consumers are less likely to spend extra time than extra money. Only 16% said they would travel an extra 10 minutes when shopping to take advantage of a $1 rebate; 5% said they'd go 20 minutes out of their way. But for a $5 rebate, more than half (58%) would spend an extra 10 minutes, 26% an extra 20 minutes. □

Liquor industry takes another hit in volume

By John C. Maxwell Jr.

Liquor sales volume dropped an estimated 2.7% last year, and consumption is expected to continue falling as people remain health-conscious.

Despite the downturn, the results are still better than 1988, when sales dropped 6.1%.

In 1989, the total whiskey segment declined an estimated 4.1%, yet imported vodkas were up 18%, and tequilas rose an estimated 5%.

Overall, white spirits are expected to continue to outperform brown spirits in 1990.

The top 10 liquor brands (ranked by case volume) welcomed a new entry last year. Carillon Importers' Absolut vodka moved from No. 18 in 1988 to No. 10, advancing 38.9% and displacing Schenley Industries' Gordon's gin. Bacardi rum remained No. 1, holding its 5.1% share of the market despite a case volume decline of 1.8%. Jim Beam bourbon moved to fifth from sixth on a volume increase of 0.8%, and Seagram's gin moved to sixth from eighth on a unit gain of 2.8%.

There was one newcomer on the list of 34 brands estimated to have sold 1 million cases or more: Paddington Corp.'s Baileys Irish Cream holds the 34th position with 1 million cases.

Among liquor marketers, Seagram Co. continues to hold the top spot with a 14% share, though with a much narrower margin than in 1988, when it had 14.5%. No. 2 Heublein gained significantly with an estimated 13.8% share in 1989, up from 12.5% in 1988. Heublein got help from its acquisition of Christian Brothers' brandy and wines.

Bacardi Corp. (6.6% share) moved up to the No. 6 position on a 0.9% percentage-point gain, primarily due to the success of its Bacardi Breezers, a spirits cooler introduced in 1988. No. 11 Carillon was another big gainer last year, up to 2.2% from its earlier 1.5% share, due primarily to Absolut.

The industry will continue to face a number of challenging issues this year. A proposed tax increase in California to fund alcohol and drug rehabilitation programs would add $6.40 per gallon to alcoholic beverages. Since California is the nation's largest market for alcoholic beverages (on a state-by-state basis), its actions could be the start of a nationwide movement.

Other issues that will be widely discussed this year are proposals for limitations on alcoholic beverage advertising, the implementation of warning labels on alcoholic beverages and a federal excise tax. □

Tequila—it's everywhere

Jose Cuervo effort shoots for margarita tie

By Patricia Winters

Jose Cuervo Especial tequila is moving to Margaritaville.

Beginning in May, Heublein's entire Jose Cuervo summer campaign is dedicated to the margarita—one of the top mixed drinks in the country. The company spends about $4 million annually on Cuervo.

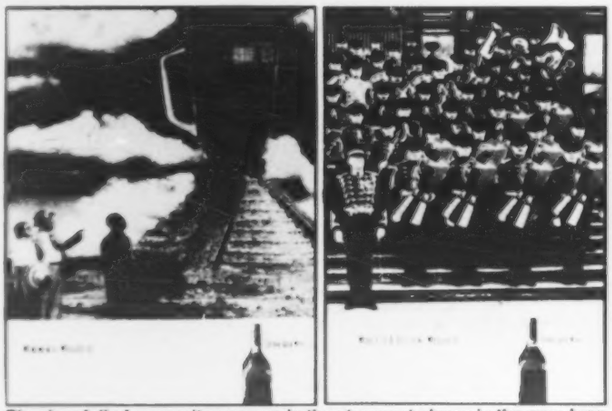
Heublein has even come up with its own margarita mneumonic, "Mo[illegible]mental margarita," that is used as a small type headline. The ads feature old b&w photographs in which electric blenders filled with bright gold Margaritas ubiquitously pop up in the strangest places.

In one ad, the blenders make their way atop an ancient ruin in Mexico. In another, blenders are the instruments in a brass band. The tagline is "Cuervo gold makes it."

"It's all part of the fun that blenders of margaritas pop up where you least expect them," said Steve Moss, Cuervo marketing director.

The campaign was created by Young & Rubicam, New York, which lost all of Heublein's estimated $15 million-to-$17 million account effective June 15 (AA, March 26).

A new agency hasn't been assigned yet, although Mr. Moss said the company intends to continue the "Monumental margarita" theme and plans several major promotions in the fourth quarter via Focus Marketing, Norwalk, Conn., Cuervo's sales promotion agency.



Blenders full of margaritas pop up in the strangest places in the new Jose Cuervo Especial tequila "Monumental margaritas" campaign.

While Heublein dropped its old tagline, "Ain't no mirage," the new campaign continues Cuervo's "irreverent, off-center personality," Mr. Moss said.

The new effort breaks in some 20 regional and national magazines, including Esquire, GQ, Rolling Stone and Cosmopolitan. Outdoor breaks the week of April 16 in select markets nationally.

By far the biggest use for tequila is as an ingredient in margaritas. Indeed, the drink's popularity has helped give acceptability to the bad-boy image of tequila.

The tequila market grew 3% to an estimated 4.3 million cases in 1989, making it one of just a handful of growing markets in the declining distilled spirits industry, reported Market Watch, a trade publication.

Even Mr. Moss conceded that not all margaritas are made with Cuervo. Still, as the market leader, increased Margarita consumption typically means increased Cuervo sales.

Cuervo case volume grew 11% to 1.8 million cases, and had a 42% market share. Domecq Importers' Sauza tequila followed with a 12.8% share, with 550,000 cases, representing a 10% increase from 1988, Market Watch reported. □

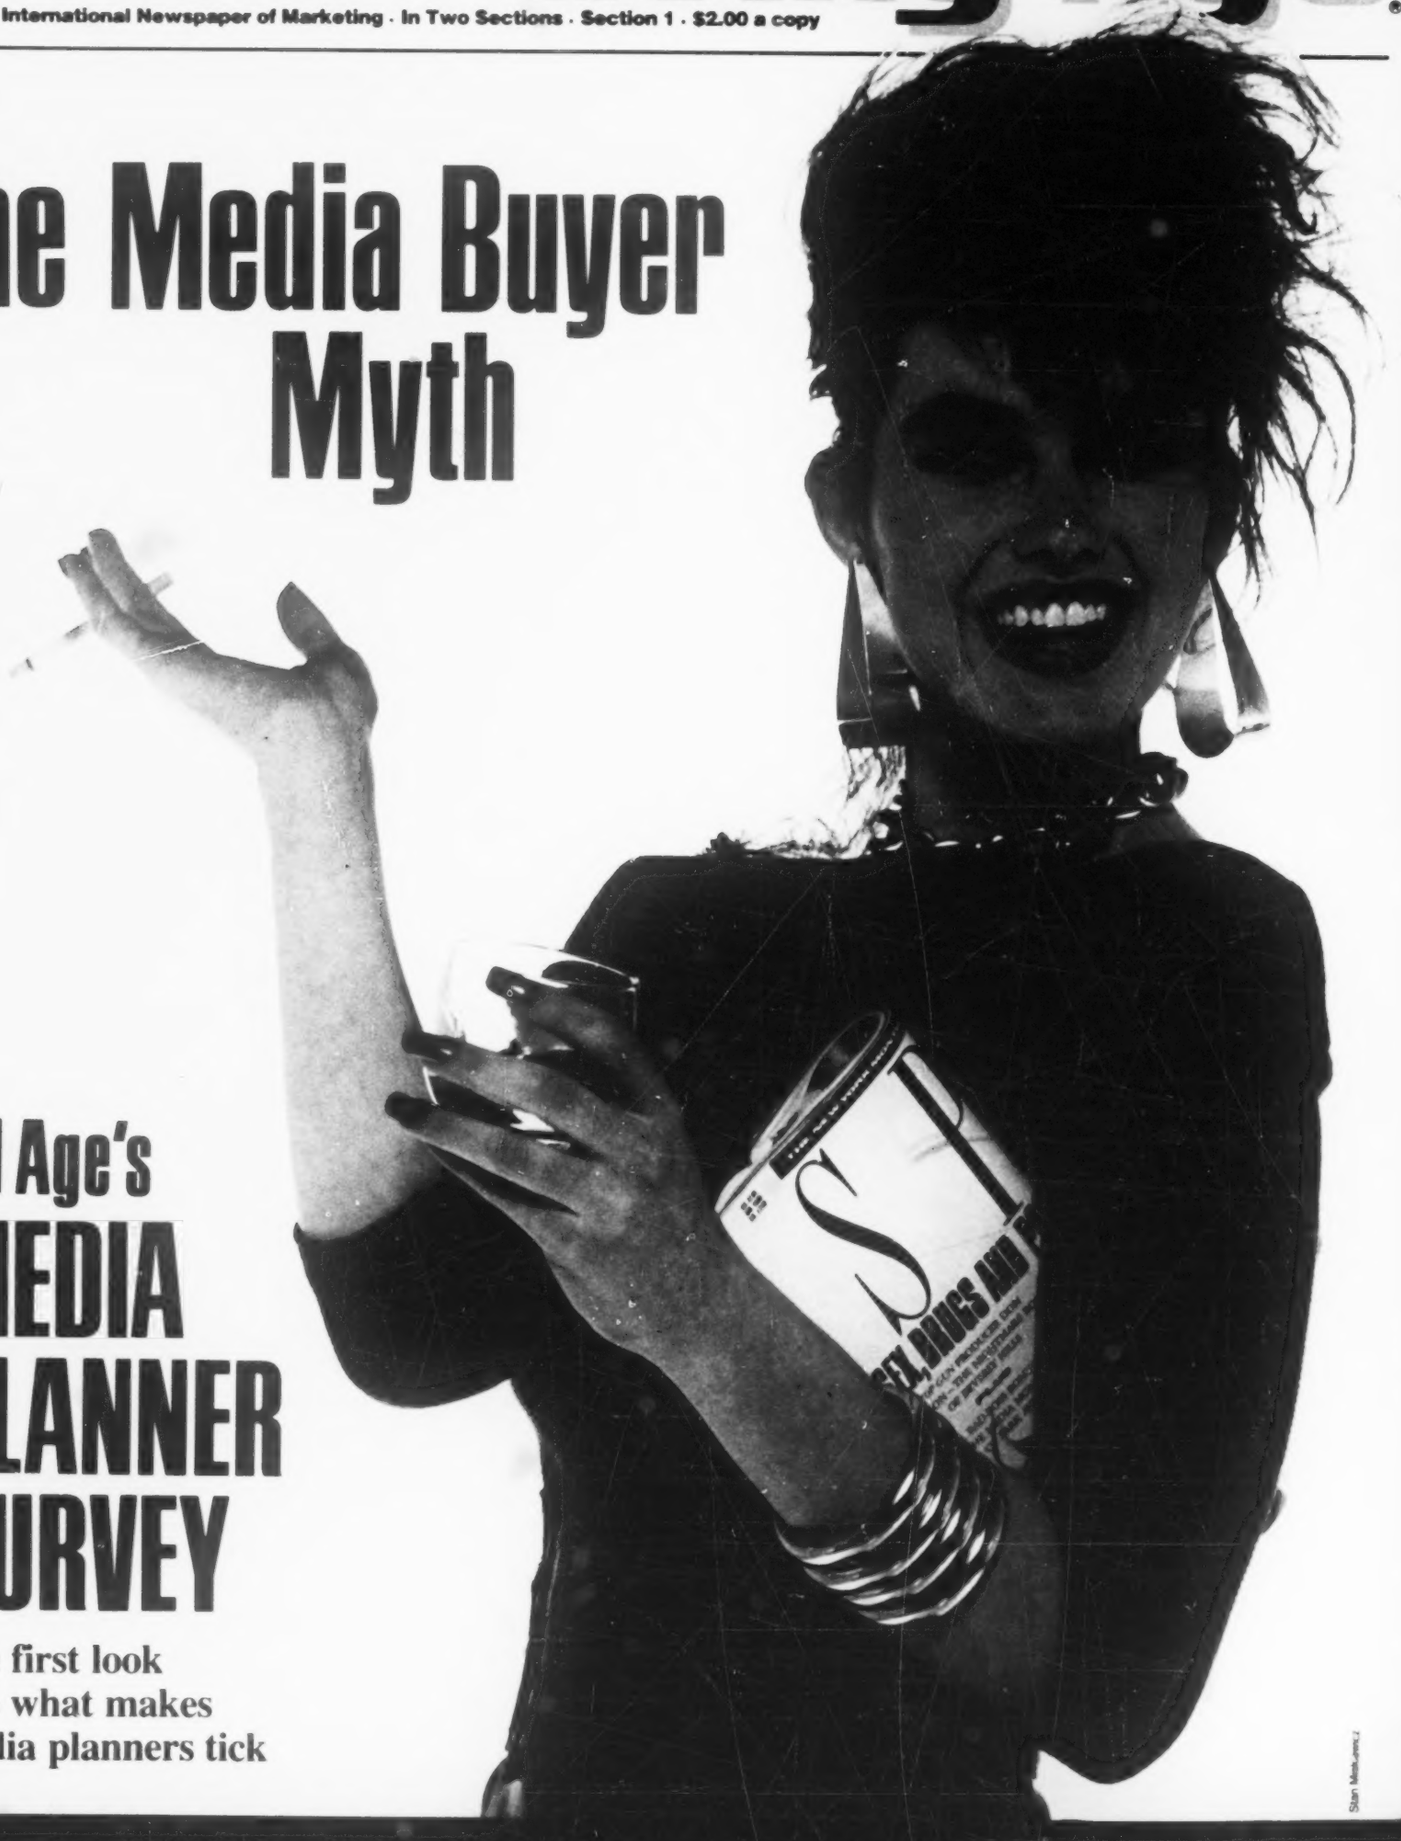
The Media Buyer Myth



Ad Age's MEDIA PLANNER SURVEY

The first look into what makes media planners tick

Alcohol warnings favored

David E. Hiltz

U.S. Rep. Joe Kennedy (at podium) and Sen. Al Gore are sponsoring a bill that would require all alcohol product advertising to include one of five health warnings.

Consumers support bill: Poll

By Joseph M. Winski

Marketers of alcoholic beverages may not like it, but health warnings on ads for their products are an acceptable idea to consumers.

In a special Advertising Age-Gallup Organization poll, nearly three-quarters—73.5%—of the people questioned said they favor warnings on beer, wine and liquor advertising.

Only 12.8% said they oppose such warnings.

A significant number—42.2%—favor an outright ban on alcoholic beverage advertising.

Only about half—49%—are opposed to such a ban; the rest said they're not sure.

The nationwide poll was conducted April 5, when Gallup questioned a random sample of 823 adults by phone. The poll has a margin of error of plus or minus 3.5%.

GALLUP SURVEY

Support for health warnings was especially strong among women. Nearly eight in 10 (79.7%) of the 429 women surveyed said they favor them, including 30% who said they "strongly favor" them.

Fewer than 10% of the women said they oppose warnings.

Of the 394 men surveyed, 67% said they favor warnings, including 30% who said they strongly favor them. Sixteen percent expressed opposition.

Asked whether they favor or oppose a ban on all beer, wine and liquor advertising, 48% of the women said yes—including 26% who said they strongly favor the idea.

Among the men, 36% said they favor a ban, including 16% who expressed strong support.

The latest survey results seem to confirm those of an Ad Age poll on beer advertising.

Industry leaders vow to battle bill

By Steven W. Colford

WASHINGTON—The advertising and alcoholic beverage industries are starting what could be a long, hard fight against moves to impose health warnings on product advertising.

Among other things, they're claiming the legislation would eliminate 15-second spots from the category.

And the category is huge. Total alcohol ad spending in 1989 was $1.04 billion, according to LNA/Arbitron Multi-Media Service, with beer accounting for $677.2 million, spirits $272.2 million, and wine, $90.9 million.

Opponents were roused to action after legislation was introduced April 4 by U.S. Sen. Al Gore (D., Tenn.) and Rep. Joe Kennedy (D., Mass.).

The Gore-Kennedy bill would require every print and broadcast alcohol ad to carry one of five rotated health warnings, ranging from "Surgeon general's warning: Drinking during pregnancy may cause mental retardation and other birth defects. Avoid alcohol during pregnancy" to "Warning: Alcohol may be hazardous if you are using any other drugs, such as over-the-counter, prescription or illicit drugs."

TV spots also would include voice-overs repeating the visual warning.

The biggest impact of the legislation would fall on broadcast advertising, ad and beer industry executives said.

"If you've got a 15-second ad and a 10- or 15-word warning, the only conclusion one

Leo Burnett USA has created another "critter" character for Kellogg Co.

Kellogg puts $30M on kids

Cereal giant needs Bigg score on presweetened entry

By Julie Liesse

Kellogg Co. is betting $30 million on the kid appeal of an animated character with chicken feet, a wolf snout, moose antlers and a pig's tail.

It's an important bet, because the world's largest cereal marketer desperately needs a new-product hit after four lackluster, but expensive, introductions—including the highly touted Heartwise cereal.

Kellogg is now introducing Bigg Mixx, also the name of the product's spokesman.

Kellogg's first new presweetened cereal in 15 years, Bigg Mixx follows in a tradition of animated characters—Tony the Tiger, Snap, Crackle & Pop, Toucan Sam, and Dig'Em—all the creations of the Kellogg/Leo Burnett USA team.

Billed as "the legendary chicken/wolf/moose/pig of the Yakima Valley," Bigg Mixx will serve as spokesman on boxes and in ads for the new cereal.

The double-entendre of the Bigg Mixx name is found inside the box: flakes made from a mix of corn, oats, rice and wheat, and lightly sweetened with brown sugar and cinnamon.

Bigg Mixx may also be the first "healthy" cereal targeted to children. Kellogg said the product, which in addition to flakes contains whole rolled oats, is the first multigrain cereal developed for children, who account for more than one-third of all ready-to-eat cereal consumption.

"More and more, parents have been buying cereals that they like and feel are healthy for their chil-

Heileman, Y&R split

CHICAGO—Young & Rubicam resigned as G. Heileman Brewing Co.'s agency after the brewer announced plans to consolidate its estimated $20 million-plus account at one or two agencies. Y&R cited declining brand support. Heileman had invited its five roster agencies, plus Campbell-Mithun-Esty (agency for Corona beer) and perhaps one or two other non-roster shops, to participate in the review. Y&R had handled Old Style and Special Export beers. Other Heileman agencies are W.B. Doner & Co., Baltimore; Chiat/Day/Mojo, San Francisco; Della Femina, McNamee WCRS, Pittsburgh; and Borders, Perrin & Norrander, Portland, Ore. Bond Corp. Holdings, which bought Heileman in 1987, has had financial troubles and, under an agreement with its banks, in recent months has been paying interest, but not principal, on its acquisition loan. That agreement ends in June. Heileman officials said Friday they will have ad money for this summer and are negotiating with banks to recapitalize the loan.

Infiniti revises ads, snubs nature theme

By Cleveland Horton

Just two months after it began featuring cars in its TV advertising, Nissan Motor Corp. USA's Infiniti division is hastily redesigning its campaign.

Executives at Infiniti agency Hill, Holliday, Connors, Cosmopulos, Marina del Rey, Calif., planned to work through the past weekend to edit a new effort scheduled to start airing April 15.

Infiniti marketing executives said the new work represents an evolution, rather than an abandonment, of the "car features" campaign that began in February. But there will be some marked differences.

The spots feature a new voice-over replacing the subdued tones of former Hill, Holliday copywriter Bill Heater; they also include music instead of long silences.

Perhaps the biggest change, however, is that they all but shun the previous emphasis on nature to focus on the cars.

"It's just an extension of what we're doing now," said David Hubbard, Infiniti's national advertising manager. "In fact, we're not really calling it a campaign. We're just building some new spots."

The spots replace commercials made up of vignettelike segments interspersing shots of nature scenes and Infiniti models. That effort represented the last Infiniti work created by Don Easdon, then exec VP-creative director. Mr. Easdon returned to the agency's Boston headquarters last month and subsequently resigned (AA, April 2).

Dan Mountain, the newly installed successor to Mr. Easdon, created the new spots (see story on Page 46).

Mr. Easdon's final Infiniti campaign represented a "transition from nature to a more product-specific type of advertising," Mr. Hubbard said. "It's [the new ads] really nothing more than that."

He characterized the new work as "a bit more traditional in terms of beginning to tell a story"; voice-overs now will reinforce the visual element of the commercials.

> "We know we're facing a tough market. It's turning around a little bit but not as fast as we'd like. It's time for us to roll up our sleeves and go to work."

Like the campaign it replaces, the new ads will play up the performance qualities of the Q45 sedan and M30 coupe.

The change was prompted by the tightening market for luxury cars and Infiniti's ongoing research, Mr. Hubbard said.

"We know we're facing a tough market," he said. "It's turning around a little bit but not as fast as we'd like. It's time for us to roll up our sleeves and go to work."

Tracking studies indicate general awareness of the Infiniti division ranks so high "it's uncanny," Mr. Hubbard said, but prospective customers' familiarity with the individual models falls below acceptable levels.

The division faced the same disparity earlier this year when it accelerated its move out of the initial image-oriented "nature scenes" launch campaign to the product-specific ad phase.

Despite the changes, sales for the division are picking up. Infiniti reported March sales of 1,549, compared to 1,075 in February and 1,071 in January.

Infiniti's sales performance trails well behind Lexus, Toyota Motor Sales USA's upscale division that began selling cars last September, two months before Infiniti. Lexus in March sold 4,861 cars.

But Infiniti insists direct sales comparisons fail to take into account its corporate goal of customer satisfaction, not volume.

In fact, Nissan lacks the capacity to produce Infiniti cars to match Lexus' projected annual sales volume of 60,000 vehicles. Infiniti steadfastly refuses to announce its sales projections.

Will the division built on "rocks and trees" ever return to a nature-laden image campaign? Perhaps, though that's not likely to happen before the middle of next year.

"I think there's a feeling around here that we all would have liked to have stuck with the nature campaign, to do more with it," Mr. Hubbard said. "But when research comes in and it says you've got tremendous awareness out there but you've got a problem in the sense that nobody knows where your products fit in ... then you've got to adjust to meet that need. That's marketing. That's what it's all about." □

States lose ad round

By Jennifer Lawrence

State officials can't regulate airline ads, a federal appeals court panel has ruled.

The decision last week by a three-judge panel of the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in New Orleans is a major setback for the state attorneys general.

Officials in California, Texas and New York said the ruling will probably be appealed to the Supreme Court. A separate but similar case is pending before the 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in New York.

In the 5th Circuit case, those three states, Washington and Massachusetts had threatened to sue several airlines, including British Airways, Continental Airlines and Trans World Airlines, for not including certain footnoted surcharges in the prominently displayed advertised fares.

After the threat, the airlines sued Texas, contending the Federal Aviation Act pre-empted state regulation of ads relating to rates, routes and services. A total of 33 other states intervened in the case.

State officials maintain the footnoting practice is deceptive and violates state laws; the U.S. Department of Transportation permits footnoting.

"We believe it is clear ... that Congress intended to retain in the federal government exclusive authority over airline advertising of fares," the three-judge panel said. "It is not as though Congress had left a vacuum that the states needed to fill in order to protect citizens."

The judges concluded that federal law expressly pre-empts "state deceptive-advertising laws as applied to airline fare advertising."

"If you accept this broad a reading of the pre-emptive statute, states can never regulate airline advertising or practices. That's not what Congress meant," said Texas Assistant Attorney General Stephen Gardner.

"We're highly disappointed and don't agree with the court's analysis," said Al Shelden, California supervising deputy attorney general. "We think this kind of ruling presents great problems for a state's abilities to enforce its own deceptive-practices act against companies that operate in more than one state. This decision, if picked up and followed by other courts, could present great problems."

In fact, oral arguments are scheduled April 20 before the 2nd Circuit in a case involving New York state and Pan American World Airways. Pre-emption also is the focus of that case.

The airlines were bolstered by the 5th Circuit ruling.

"The decision of a federal circuit court opining that the federal government has expressly pre-empted anything relating to rates, routes and services is comprehensive and sweeping," said one airline attorney directly involved in the case. "This is the leading opinion on the subject."

"One would expect the federal court's ruling to be instructive" to the state courts, he said. "We're all one country here."

The National Association of Attorneys General in 1987 adopted national airfare ad guidelines. The states contended Reagan administration officials weren't doing enough to protect consumers.

However, "even under the Bush administration, the DOT is uninterested in protecting the rights of traveling consumers and is only interested in toadying to the demands of a relatively few airlines that choose to advertise deceptively," Mr. Gardner said.

State efforts to regulate national advertising in other areas, such as foods, automobiles, car rental services and environmental claims, are not directly affected by the 5th Circuit ruling. □

'Meddling' in creative more welcome

Increasingly active media groups are creating a new harmony within agency structure

By Gary Levin

CROSSING THE LINE ••••

There's a creative revolution taking root in ad agencies today. The thing is, it isn't necessarily coming from creatives.

More and more creative directors are turning to media departments to make their best ideas work harder.

Important in some cases, media people are even initiating ideas for new campaigns.

"There's an increasing amount of fraternization and discussion with creatives," says Richard Kostyra, exec VP-U.S. director of media services at J. Walter Thompson Co. "The idea is to exploit to the maximum program-type positioning or magazine placement. It's becoming a more competitive market and it's harder to stand out."

Media planning is no longer an after-the-fact complement to a new campaign.

Media executives say they're working more closely than ever with creatives to allow media selection to help shape the creative process, often before a single ad is written. They say account planning and the increasing push for breakthrough advertising are the major forces behind the new harmony.

Single-sponsor magazine issues and "bookend" split-30s wrapped around other TV spots are merely the start of the trend toward media-creative collaboration.

Among the more noteworthy campaigns based on tight media-creative partnerships is the one for Carillon Importers' Absolut vodka.

Carillon and TBWA, its New York agency, meet with a slew of magazines once each year to set big-selling Absolut's annual media schedule, which consists of up to 100 magazines.

For its ad to run in Playboy, Carillon Importers ran an "Absolut Centerfold," complete with its ambitions: "To always be cool, with or without ice."

After that process is completed, the agency's creative department is charged with creating several media-specific ads to run, for example, in business publications or theater playbills or Playboy. An "Absolut Bravo" ad in playbills has roses adorning the clear bottle, while business magazines trumpet a Mad-magazine style "Absolut Merger" foldout.

Sometimes, however, creatives will develop an ad for a magazine not even on the schedule, as was the case with Playboy's "Absolut Centerfold" ad, which portrayed its playmate bottle ("11-inch bust, 11-inch waist and 11-inch hips").

The process doesn't require a major reorientation of TBWA's media department, but it has had an impact on the agency.

"What Carillon has done for us is give us a more open mind and put more demand on all departments to be creative in their ideas than might be the case otherwise," says Richard Costello, TBWA's president and chief operating officer.

Among regional campaigns, DDB Needham Worldwide's work for the New York state lottery pinpointed subway stations, phone kiosks and other media targets—often located near lottery sales agents—and then developed specific ads to run in each along with a more general campaign.

In that series, themed "All you need is a dollar and a dream," real

Survey quirks and conundrums

Advertising Age sent three separate survey forms to a geographically dispersed sample of media representatives, agency media directors and agency media buyers/media planners.

Of the 179 total respondents, 54.2% carry the title of media buyer/media planner, 30.7% are media directors, 15.1% are media representatives such as top executives at multi-media companies, magazines, newspapers, broadcast and cable TV networks or radio companies.

The universe of those carrying the media buyer/media planner title includes a random sample of all U.S. agencies, including both large and small shops.

Although those persons carrying the title of media buyer received the survey because agency media department media planner moniker was used throughout the survey questionnaire for continuity.

The media director list comprised a geographically-dispersed sample of top executives in media departments at medium to large agencies. The discrepancy in agency sizes may help explain slight inconsistencies in reporting such elements as the number of supervisors overseeing media planning and salary levels.

For example, media buyers/media planners report that their work is reviewed by 1.3 supervisors on average. Media directors, however, report an average of 10 media buyers/planners on their staffs with five reviewing supervisors, leading to an average of two reviewing supervisors per buyer/planner.

from sampled media directors working with larger media departments than responding buyers/planners.

In terms of salary levels, 15.8% of buyers/planners reported their starting salaries were less than $13,000, while no media director reported a starting salary at that level in their department. Current average salaries of media buyers/planners also skewed higher in media directors' reports than those received from buyers/planners.

The total survey sample of 179 is indicative of media department structure and trends, but must be considered too small to statistically represent the entire industry. It is, however, a good barometer of prevailing opinion on the subject of media buying and planning.

Additionally, some charts may not total 100% because of rounding of fig-and fictional lottery buyers are asked what they'd do with their potential winnings; one man says he'd "trade in this subway car for a chauffeured limousine."

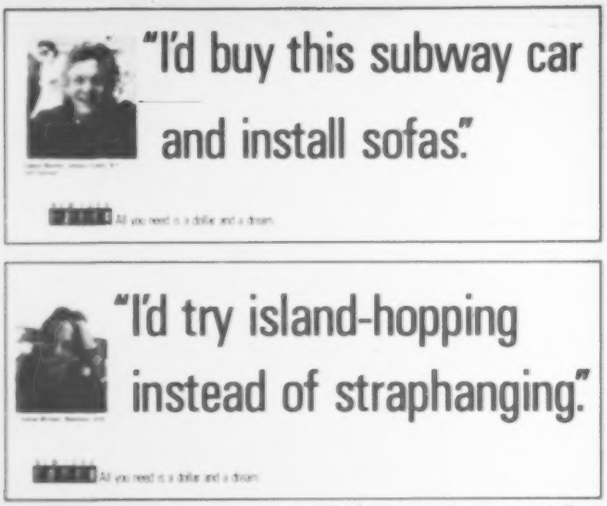
"We have taken the attitude that we try to identify media apertures before we initiate the creative development," says Peter Tate, exec VP at DDB Needham's New York office.

After developing a list of TV programs appealing to working women, the agency decided what spot TV placements would yield the best response for Campbell Soup Co.'s Mrs. Paul's seafood when the target audience is deciding what to do for dinner.

"We went down and presented



"I'd buy this subway car and install sofas."
All you need is a dollar and a dream.
"I'd try island-hopping instead of straphanging."
All you need is a dollar and a dream.

After locating media targets near New York state lottery agents, DDB Needham tailored media taglines to the place: "I'd try island-hopping instead of straphanging."

the media plan before any creative was written," says Page Thompson, exec VP-media director.

Closer cooperation between creative and media people takes many forms. At some agencies, physical proximity and inclusion in creative strategy sessions gives media people the opportunity to offer constructive suggestions.

"I think because of the way we're situated...where we've got people mixed on every different floor...there's more access," says Patrick Cunningham, exec VP-chief creative officer at N W Ayer.

DDB Needham has created a "personal media network," which aids creative planning by developing a list of choices made by the loyal user of a particular brand before campaigns are developed.

"For every one of our products, we are writing a personal media plan for the core target audience," says Mike White, senior VP-media director at DDB Needham's Chicago office.

Still others use no new-fangled labels or physical structures, but old-fashioned techniques like the telephone.

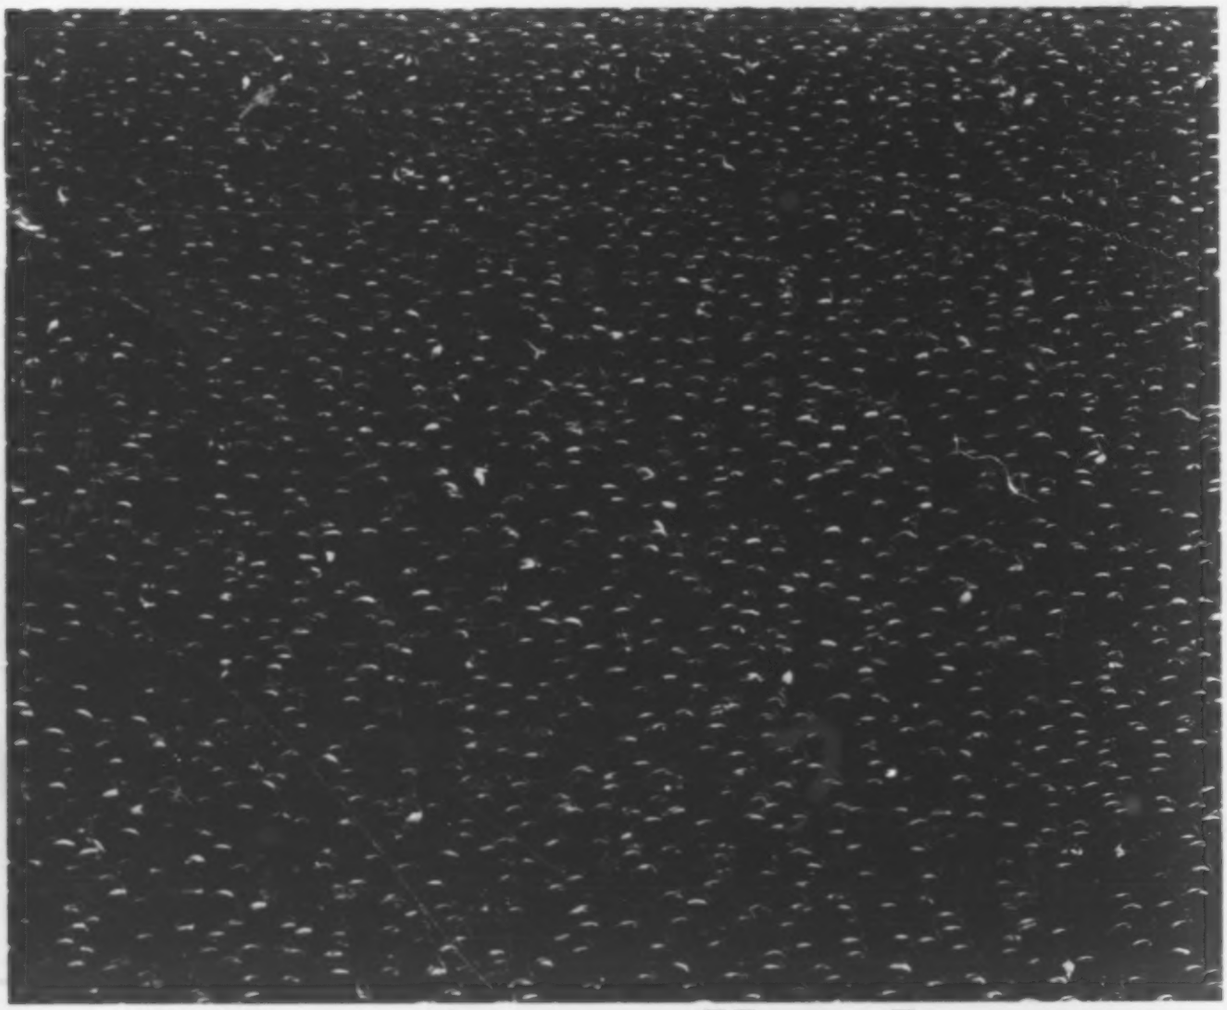
"It effectively requires the media person to call the creative person and say, 'What are you thinking of?'" says Mr. Kostyra. "It often can be done through the account group in terms of [account execs] giving us leads."

Media executives also can help extend the life of a campaign by expanding its reach.

For Colgate-Palmolive Co., FCB/Leber Katz Partners, New York, created a poster showing three identical rowhouses. A spotless house between two dirty ones is captioned, "Ajax was here." The ad, originally used on Actmedia shopping carts, has since been transformed into a TV campaign and more recently, into outdoor and transit advertising.

"Sometimes creatives will have a great idea, and they'll seek the help of the media department to find an avenue [to run] the ad," says Ted Littleford, senior exec VP-executive creative director at the agency.

Still other creatives simply seek complementary media placements for spots they've already created for general usage. "When Wrigley Field turned its lights on for the first time, we arranged to have our nighttime baseball spot for [General Electric] running in the first pod of the first spots," says Phil Dusenberry, ceo of BBDO Worldwide's New York office. □



49 MILLION AMERICAN HOMES INCLUDE DISCOVERY™ IN THEIR PLANS. YOU SHOULD, TOO.

Audiences have made Discovery™ the fastest-growing network among the top ten. In fact, they've made us the fastest-growing basic cable network in history for three years in a row.

Discovery has become an essential part of most media plans. Available in 49 million American homes. Nearly 90% of all cable homes. 53% of all TV households*.

We're just 7 points behind cable's leader. And with our phenomenal growth rate, it won't take us long to catch up.

So if you've planned to put cable in your buy, put Discovery at the top of your list. Because in a matter of months that's probably where we'll be.

Does your agency have a formal training program for media planners?

- Media directors

  - No: 38.2%
- Media buyers and planners
  - Yes: 19.6%
  - No: 80.4%

Here's where media sellers start to show their real opinions about buyers and planners.

Only 11.5% think you're being watched more closely now than your colleagues of five years ago.

But in one of those crazy inconsistencies, most media sellers think your work is revised regularly, a statement both you and your supervisors agree with wholeheartedly.

In fact, 43.1% of your bosses say you are being supervised more closely, and 56.2% of your colleagues say close supervision is a fact of your job life.

Another thing on which all of you agree: Media planning and buying is a learn-as-you-go process, indicating tenure in the job is a big factor in determining your expertise.

Training would help, but only 19.6% of you say you were offered any. However, 80.4% of media directors say they offer training, a response most likely skewed by the large percentage of surveyed directors in big shops.

Perception: The buy can be bought Reality: Bite your tongue

We got your dander up with this question.

In another switch, media sellers say media buyers and planners are not an easy group to sway, yet are greatly influenced by perquisites. In fact, only 7.7% say perks don't play a role in media buying. So you can't be swayed, but you can be bought.

Not so, media buyers and planners insist–at least most of you.

According to the survey, almost one out of five media buyers' and planners' heads can be turned by a cruise on Forbes' Highlander yacht. Yet almost half report perks never enter the picture.

Characteristic of the many comments received on the subject is the following from a media planner at a major Chicago agency: "One of the most misleading perceptions of the media planner is that we are influenced by extra gifts from sales reps. I can personally say that my choices are not influenced by these extras, and I know many who feel the same.

"We're trying to help sell product, and regardless of the courting, if a certain medium does not fit into an advertising plan, we'll choose one that does," she says.

Your boss loves you. Media directors hate this stereotype of the power of the perk. Only 5.9% say perks factor into buying and planning decisions.

Perception: They pick media they like Reality: Nah! No way!...Well, maybe TV

Spot TV Power Players

Before any media plan ever makes it to fruition, chances are two to 20 media-philes have given it their 2¢.

For agencies whose media departments comprise hundreds of people from the assistant junior buyer level to senior exec VPs with titles longer than their ABC printouts, those pennies can really add up.

To find out where the buck finally stops, Advertising Age went in search of the country's Media Power Players—those executives who plan the strategies or control the budgets on some of the largest media assignments.

We focused on the executives responsible for media budgeting and planning decisions on the top-selling brands and companies as listed by LNA/Arbitron Multi-Media Services. Media spending figures also were culled from these lists.

With numbers in hand, Alicia Lasek and Ken Wylie contacted the brands' parent companies, ad agencies or media buying services to determine just who is ultimately responsible for media budgeting and planning.

Those individuals were chosen Advertising Age Media Power Players.

Gerri Donini
senior VP-mgr/broadcast purchasing
Young & Rubicam, New York

Account: Kentucky Fried Chicken.

Spot TV spending: Jan.-Sept. 1989: $35.1 million; Jan.-Sept. 1988: $28.3 million.

On spending increases: "Television budgets will stay flat for 1990, partly because of the economy, and I believe costs will go down. I don't know if they can keep these rates up where they are."

On managing a big budget: "The size of the budget allows for a lot of creativity. We're more able to do special things in sports, like being part of 'Monday Night Football' and the NCAA."

First media job: Started at BBDO Worldwide, New York.

Lisa Wegmann
broadcast supervisor-Los Angeles media buyer
Chiat/Day/Mojo, Venice, Calif.

Account: Nissan Motor Corp. USA, passenger cars and light trucks.

Spot TV spending: Jan.-Sept. 1989: $34.7 million; Jan.-Sept. 1988: $31.8 million.

On managing a big budget: "It does help that I have some clout. L.A.'s always sold out ... it's definitely a seller's market. I can't just go in and say, 'I'm Lisa Wegmann, I want to place some ads.' When we really need a favor for Nissan, they know how much we spend, and they'll give it to us. People say, 'Chiat/Day, we've gotta play.' "

Stuart Shlossman
senior VP-associate director of national broadcast
BBDO Worldwide, New York

Account: PepsiCo's Pepsi-Cola.

Spot TV spending: Jan.-Sept. 1989: $26.7 million; Jan.-Sept. 1988: $29.2 million.

On spending levels: "The size of the soft-drink business has been increasing tremendously, and diet drinks have grown in sales, so the category is very competitive.

"The Coke-Pepsi nature of the business makes it very exciting or very painful if you're on the losing end, which we're not usually as media buyers."

On managing a big budget: "The size of a budget does not have a direct correlation with creativity —but more so with the nature of the account. With Pepsi, the progressiveness of their media department is why they are what they are."

On business trends: "At McCann-Erickson, [where I worked previously,] I had the total budget for the AT&T account. It was exciting during the break-up of the Bell system, but not necessarily innovative. It was simply managing an account that kept getting bigger on a daily basis."

First media job: Assistant media planner at SSC&B, New York.

Claude Cayler
senior director of field marketing and media supervisor
Pizza Hut, Wichita, Kan.

Account: Pizza Hut.

Spot TV spending: Jan.-Sept. 1989: $41.7 million; Jan.-Sept. 1988: $42.8 million.

On managing a big budget: "In previous lives, I've bought for smaller and larger clients, and it depends on the negotiator whether [business is] good or not.

"I look at each spot opportunity that we have as a direct-response opportunity for us."

Al Orlick
senior VP-associate media director
Ogilvy & Mather, New York

Account: Hardee's Food Systems.

Spot TV spending: Jan.-Sept. 1989: $29.3 million; Jan.-Sept. 1988: $30.0 million.

On managing a big budget: "Working with Hardee's is a collaborative effort, and that includes media decisions. We work together on a team premise.

"They encourage us to seek out the innovative. So it's not a question of 'power'—who has the power—but getting the best for the client and how we do that.

"Some companies have no media department, but Hardee's does. They're savvy about media. And the more a client knows about media, the better for us."

First media job: Mr. Orlick entered the advertising business more than 20 years ago at Ogilvy & Mather, where he worked with clients such as Lever Bros., Pepperidge Farm and Hershey chocolate.

Advertising Age Power Players are those people identified as having the responsibility for media budgeting and planning decisions on the top-spending brands in each of the nine media measured by LNA/Arbitron Multi-Media Services. Names were provided by the client or its agency. Interviews were conducted by Alicia Lasek and Ken Wylie.

Note: Some power players appear in more than one category.

Network TV Power Players

Chuck Fruit
VP-corporate media & sports
Anheuser-Busch

Account: Budweiser, Michelob Dry

Network TV spending Jan.-Sept. 1989 vs. Jan.-Sept. 1988: Budweiser—$33.8 million vs. $50.8 million; Michelob Dry (first year)—$31.5 million.

On spending levels: "Any spending increases in 1989 can be attributed to the introduction of Michelob Dry beer. Other than that, spending in '88 and '89 was basically the same, recognizing that '88 was an Olympic year."

On managing a big budget: "Even though Anheuser-Busch has a big ad budget overall, there are still areas we're not so big. But in most sports areas, we are.

"I get a chance to work with so many stations, clubs and networks. I get a broader perspective that allows me to compare one organization with another. Also, an opportunity to work with so many great people in sports media and management."

First media job: "I started in 1970 with Gardner Advertising in St. Louis—just out of college. On my first day, my assignment was a project with Cardinal Baseball Radio Marketing. Twenty years later, I'm still doing the same thing."

Gerri Donini
senior VP-mgr., broadcast purchasing
Young & Rubicam, New York

Account: Kentucky Fried Chicken

Network TV spending: Jan.-Sept. 1989: $48.9 million; Jan.-Sept. 1988: $42.8 million.

On spending increases: "Television budgets will stay flat for 1990, partly because of the economy, and I believe costs will go down. I don't know if they can keep these rates up where they are."

On managing a big budget: "The size of the budget allows for a lot of creativity. We're more able to do special things in sports, like being part of 'Monday Night Football' and the NCAA."

First media job: Started at BBDO Worldwide, New York.

Charlie Rutman
senior VP-corporate media director
Backer Spielvogel Bates Worldwide, New York

Account: Wendy's restaurants, Wendy's International

Network TV spending: Jan.-Sept. 1989: $34.4 million; Jan.-Sept. 1988: $36.7 million.

On spending decreases: "[Wendy's] makes small swings in spending from year to year in variations of syndication and cable with network."

On managing a big budget: "I can't believe that the size of the budget is a decisive factor in being creative, motivated, aggressive, conservative.

"A smaller client can be just as innovative as a big one. So what it comes down to is the question: Is the client willing to seek out opportunities?

"Our clients encourage innovation and risk-taking.

"Money, of course, does open up more choices, adds to our options, giving us more alternatives.

"This is exciting. But I don't find budgets intimidating."

First media job: Started in advertising at McCaffrey & Ratner, New York, in the media and research department.

David Robertson
advertising director-consumer communications services
AT&T Co., Basking Ridge, N.J.

Account: AT&T long-distance business lines.

Network TV spending: Jan.-Sept. 1989: $48.0 million; Jan.-Sept. 1988: $24.3 million.

On spending increases: "AT&T is offering a variety of new products and services, so our goal is to make customers more aware of their options.

"We've put more into television and media in general so the public can make more informed choices. There are more people out there saying more things to customers—there's more information they have to sort through.

"We're trying to help complete a customer's snapshot of the industry."

On industry trends: "The media and the message itself must be in sync. There has to be a sympatico between advertising and programming—you have to be relevant, and that drives you into more particular kinds of vehicles.

"As media becomes de-massified with new syndication in television and different lifestyle publications in print, you may not have the kind of reach you once had."

First media job: At Michael Davis Shipping Co., Los Angeles.

Richard Ross
director of marketing
General Motors Corp.'s Oldsmobile division, Lansing, Mich.

Account: Oldsmobile Cutlass automobiles

Network TV spending: Jan.-Sept. 1989: $30.8 million; Jan.-Sept. 1988: $32.0 million.

Why he buys network TV: "With input from Burnett's media staff, we look at each task, such as a new-product launch, and consider it separately. For mass awareness, we use network TV.

"We want to know what kind of flight levels. We use the calendar to set the time for flights to reach some pretty well-defined targets. The agency media people come back to us with launches for network, cable and syndicated TV. They come up with a plan for dayparts, sport, nightly news."

First advertising job: Started as a clerk in GM's advertising department. □

OK, so you media planners are supposed to be single-handedly responsible for the growth of trendy new magazine titles, such as Spy, and quirky cable programs, and that without your personal bias, these things would never draw an ad dollar.

Don't get huffy now, we're just repeating the perception.

Only 7.7% of media sellers think you recommend media you don't personally use. Yes, that's 7.7%!

And most sellers think you and your supervisors are out of touch in terms of media choices and preferences. Only 15.4% of the sellers feel both you and your supervisors are equally responsive to trend-oriented media, and most think you use different media than your supervisors in your free time. (They do, however, give your bosses credit for being familiar with the media you recommend.)

Like we said, we're just repeating the perception.

Most buyers and planners agree that one perception is reality: 35.3% say you are more responsive to trend-oriented media than your bosses.

However, both you and your supervisors disagree with sellers that you recommend media you personally use and that your bosses are unfamiliar with media you suggest in plans.

In fact, you think you're on a closer wavelength with your supervisors than they do: Only 21.9% of you thought you personally preferred different media than senior media staffers, while 58.8% of media directors say they're reading, listening and watching different media than their staff members.

Can we put those perceptions to rest? Ah, not so fast. What about Spy? What about tilting toward the tube?

Leisure pursuits

'Time,' 'People' hold their attention

Media buyers and planners earn their salaries by determining what media other people are reading, watching and listening to.

What are they doing when they're away from the office?

Chances are they're reading magazines, watching TV or listening to the radio.

Buyers and planners often are accused of favoring TV shows, magazines and cable networks they personally use. While they really hate this stereotype, they should acknowledge the source of the accusations. Often the people selling the magazine or program the planner/buyer has weeded out.

To reach buyers and planners, media sellers might do well by buying an ad in one of their favorite media.

Just what do they like? Advertising Age's Media Planning Practices Survey asked media buyers/planners, directors to name the three TV shows, magazines, newspapers, cable networks and radio formats they're most likely to be tuned into when they're out of the office. ☐

Sunday Power Players

On spending increases: "We were the forerunners in the industry in Sunday magazines. Many people have followed suit by looking at Sunday magazines as a viable media."

On managing a big budget: "Having proven our success has made the job easier. When you're doing a program as consistent as ours, there's not a lot of changing schedules and going back and forth. We know a year in advance what we're going to be doing."

On buying Sunday magazines: "We've found a medium that hasn't been fully exploited yet.

"The efficiency of the buy is what's been happening for us vs. pre-supplied preprints, for example.

"Sunday magazines allow good penetration into specific markets.

"For 1990, you'll probably see a continued effort and possibly further expansion and more scheduling to our other media efforts.

"We don't like to duplicate our efforts in a certain category."

Roles expand in value-added era

By Scott Donaton

It was early 1988, a full year before the term "value-added marketing partnerships" would become part of every media professional's vocabulary.

Bill Murphy, director of Meredith Corp.'s Custom Marketing division, was pitching a group of ad agency media planners on a multimedia package he had designed to help solve clients' marketing problems.

"Their eyes went wide," Mr. Murphy remembers. "They realized it was a great idea. But in the backs of their minds, you could see they were having trouble figuring out how it was going to be executed."

Two years and several such deals later, most agency executives have quite a different reaction.

According to results from Advertising Age's Media Planning Practices Survey, adding value to traditional media placements has arrived.

When asked to identify the biggest trends and issues in media buying today, 28.3% of media directors responded with value-added buys. The only subjects to garner more mentions were issues relating to media costs and rate negotiations, which were listed by 50.9% of media directors.

With media companies eager to bundle their various properties for advertisers or put together massive added-value programs, a new species of media director has begun to evolve, one with the mental tools to evaluate and execute complex deals encompassing several marketing disciplines.

"The buying process has changed to the extent that the normal criteria used in the past are being augmented by promotions, merchandising and marketing partnerships and are bringing into play more skills," says Neil Jacobs, VP, Conde Nast Package. "Agencies have to get involved in those areas."

Executives on both the agency and media side are quick to point out that the concept of marketing partnerships is new and virtually unexplored. But they also understand the opportunities presented by such partnerships and the risks involved in not preparing for them.

"It's pretty easy to overstate the volume of mega-deals because they're new and exciting," says Donald Elliman, exec VP-marketing at Time Inc. Magazine Co. "Still, the media department has to adapt to be able to evaluate

A Hot Tip For Media Buyers

If you're looking to make a cost-effective buy of a top 10 market, here's a hot tip. At the southern tip of Florida is a dynamic ADI that ranks #15 in the nation in population. But...

When you buy South Florida, you're really buying a top 10 market

Nationally, South Florida ranks:
- #1 in gross media revenues
- #1 in automotive dealer sales
- #1 in drug store sales
- #2 in total retail sales per household
- #2 in apparel & accessories store sales
- #3 in furniture/home furnishings/ appliance store sales

The Miami Herald is one of the nation's top 10 newspapers

Every day, The Herald is read by over a million of South Florida's most inquisitive, acquisitive adults. It also boasts primary market penetration second only to one newspaper in the top 10 ADIs.

Reach of Largest Newspapers — Top 10 ADIs and Miami

Market	Coverage Daily	Coverage Sunday	Market	Coverage Daily	Coverage Sunday
Washington D.C.	51%	71%	Los Angeles	29%	40%
Miami	44	53	New York	28	32
Houston	40	52	Philadelphia	27	47
Detroit	40	49	San Francisco	27	37
Boston	33	49	Dallas	27	36
Chicago	33	47

South Florida is the nation's third largest Hispanic market

But compared to the national average, Hispanics here are better educated, hold better jobs and have higher median incomes. South Florida's one million plus Hispanics have made El Nuevo Herald the largest Spanish-language daily in the continental U.S. Our audited circulation confirms it.

Make The Miami Herald and El Nuevo Herald a vital part of your next media buy. And put a hot tip to work for you.

Many buyers and planners cried "Foul" over this series of statements, and we have to come clean and agree.

We were expecting to get 100% response of "Don't know" or "No" or even more colorful statements, such as one provided by a buyer at a Seattle shop: "This is stupid. It depends on the objectives of the campaign." In fact, 46.4% of buyers and planners–and 54.7% of media directors–responded with a uniform "No" or "Don't know," which we assume to mean you also found it stupid.

Sure, it's stupid, but look at the number of people who think your media choices are biased. (And because we're talking "perception/reality" here, you should know only two media sellers provided solid "No" or "Don't know" responses.)

A lot of folks–your colleagues included–provided "Yes" answers. And when they said "Yes," it was to broadcast TV and specialty magazines. A bit of that perception may be reality.

While you're envisioning media reps at Spy and NBC dialing your number, you also should expect a call from your favorite radio salesperson. Although no media directors or media sellers assumed a favoritism toward radio, 18.8% of you say you lean toward the medium.

SALARY SLAVES

Not long after graduating from college in 1987, Melanie Saltzman entered a world of darkness: She became an assistant media buyer.

Living on a salary of under $17,000, Ms. Saltzman commuted from her parents' home in Westport, Conn., where she would catch the 5:59 a.m. train to Manhattan for her entry-level job at Chiat/Day/Mojo and return home about 8:30 p.m. If she skipped lunch, which she often did, Ms. Saltzman scarcely saw the light of day.

Since then Ms. Saltzman has moved up, to Manhattan, where she shares a two-bedroom apartment with two friends. For a while it seemed ideal, but things have gotten a little crowded: Ms. Saltzman sleeps in the living room.

"I don't have a social life," she laments.

Thanks to several raises, Ms. Saltzman will soon move into an apartment with just one roommate, and will find herself living in luxury: She will have her own bedroom and bath.

Like most entry-level media staffers, Ms. Saltzman is still working brutal hours, but that's a fact of the business she is willing to accept.

"You have to get the work done, and that's that," she says.

According to Advertising Age's Media Planning Practices Survey, Ms. Saltzman is not alone: 35.8% of media buyers reported starting salaries of $13,001 to $17,000 and 36.8% said they started at $17,000 to $21,000 (see charts at left).

"People have to learn a whole new profession; no one is really prepared for this job," says Larry Cole, exec VP-U.S. media director for Ogilvy & Mather Worldwide, New York.

Starting salaries always have been low in the field, particularly for bachelor's degree-level entrants, because media buying is perceived as being the bottom rung of the ladder, he adds.

But Mr. Cole says performance is quickly rewarded. The industry standard is generally to consider raises every six months for the first two years.

"There are very few jobs where you can double your starting salary in three years and quadruple it in five," he says.

Martin Block, director of the advertising department at Northwestern University's Medill School of Journalism, blames low starting pay on the advertising industry's "glamor factor."

"The ethic in the industry is to give lots of entrants a chance,

Media planners take heart. Those people out there trying to convince you to buy space or time pity your pittance. Only 11.5% of sellers responding to the survey disagreed with the statement that you are underpaid–and they think you make more money than you actually do.

About 73% of media sellers think your starting pay was less than $21,000, although more than 88% say you now earn more than that.

And while 88.4% of you say your starting pay was less than $21,000, 68.9% of you are now earning over that level. So, while the pay does stink, it gets a bit better.

Unless, of course, your bosses have their way: 49% of media directors say the average salary for a media planner in their department is between $21,001 and $25,000.

The salary situation was not lost on most buyers and planners who responded to the survey. The sentiment was best expressed by one of your colleagues in a New York agency: "The money sucks–plain and simple. How can you get the best people and hold on to them when they can go anywhere else and make real money?"

Roundtable

media sales person is going to have to change, too. It's not going to be simply selling pages. One publisher told me he has added an entire promotion and marketing staff—which he didn't have before—to deal with some of the new ways agencies and advertisers expect him to participate.

Mr. Knapp: What kind of sales rep would you like to see work with you to develop a client's interest?

Mr. Drexler: I think there will be a blur between media and promotion; there will be more media-oriented promotions. We will look at the client's marketing objectives, media objectives, and try to develop some ideas for pursuing this value-added partnership. We will then call in the various media and suggest that they bring in their promotion people, merchandising people, editorial people and anyone else who might be able to bring something to a larger program.

Mr. Ostrow: A lot of these value-added things represent accountability, which is a tremendous opportunity for the magazine industry to prove that magazines can deliver something tangible, measurable and meaningful.

When you can marry promotion, PR, direct response and all of those things together, you're in a position to do the testing that we've been screaming for years for magazines to do.

Joe Cappo: Publications are setting up merchandising departments. There aren't any merchandising departments as such in ad agencies to deal with the same kind of marketing problems that the clients have.

Jim Guthrie: They were there once. They went away about 15 years ago, when clients didn't give agencies a larger part of the promotion budget. Now, with clients under the same pressure everybody else is, the client's promotion departments have declined as well. It's going back into brand management . . . Phil Guarascio (executive director-advertising and strategic merchandising at General Motors) says he's looking for somebody who can deal with a lot of media and marketing problems at the same time. A Renaissance Man, he calls him.

Michael Drake: We're talking about a share battle here, in many cases. The larger publishing groups have an insider's edge in the way they can discount. And I don't know if agencies are really set up to handle this.

Mr. Ostrow: Time Warner, on one channel in Rochester, N.Y., is going to marry about a half-dozen different things. In companies that have outdoor, magazines, newspapers, broadcast, you've got to have somebody who can put those things together.

Mr. Knapp: We are constantly challenged to come up with our own packages, or make deals with other media, to satisfy your client's program. Do you envision an agency being in a role where they could bring in various media themselves?

Mr. Ostrow: An agency has to take the role of making certain combinations happen.

Doug Goodman

Stretching marketing packages across media will dramatically affect executives such as MPA's Jim Guthrie, FCB's Joseph Ostrow and Cleon T. "Bud" Knapp of Knapp Communications.

Abbott Wool: Years ago, the weaker media started doing this sort of thing. Network radio was building into deals 0.5% for merchandising, and then putting together a contest. They would make your product the prize. Spot radio and Spanish radio would go into stores and get distribution for you. That was real value-added for them. Magazines have been going through years of weakness, page and circulation losses, and now that cable has grown, the networks are starting to do these things.

Mr. Drexler: I think magazines have been closer to the marketing process than perhaps most other media.

Mr. Cole: Local media have understood promotions and local needs because they didn't have inroads to national agencies. They had inroads with local sales people.

Mr. Knapp: We're relatively small, without radio or TV stations, printing presses, etc. And there are probably thousands of magazines that are smaller than my company. How can we compete? When you begin adding services, or direct mail, public relations, whatever, how do you price this?

Mr. Ostrow: The rate card was set by calendar rather than by cost: It's the new year so it's time to put in a price increase. Now, it's "Cut the rate card. Get all the meat off the bone and start cutting into the bone." We don't want to see that happen either. What they have to do is look at value; they don't have to cut into the bone.

Mr. Knapp: It's hard to sell that to the agencies because pricing is always suspect.

Mr. Ostrow: It's suspect because you have so many things that have absolutely no reason for being, like bleed charges. Bite the bullet and increase your rates to accommodate the bleed charges; don't keep that very archaic, suspect and negative perspective of, "I'm charging for something that doesn't cost me any money."

Mr. Cappo: Actually, the economics of broadcasting are less logical than the economics of publishing. We find, with the deterioration in network TV audiences, that TV is selling for premium prices now, higher than ever before, with the biggest upfront ever. That's not logical.

Mr. Link: What it boils down to is that there are fewer gross rating points being generated, and more dollars chasing them.

Mr. Cappo: From the operating end of the business, broadcasting is really not a cost-plus business. Publishing is a cost-plus business.

Mr. Link: That's not true. The margins that broadcasters enjoyed in establishing the marketplace make more of a difference than the margins of other businesses.

Mr. Guthrie: A magazine's identity, what it stands for, is an awfully important point. When they put together packages, how certain can they be that next year you don't try and bid them out for a better price on that package?

Mr. Drexler: It's a little absurd to suggest that the promotion is the dog and the product is the tail. The inherent value of the product is the starting point. That's what you concentrate on. Lose that relationship with your reader, even for a short time, and you're in big trouble.

Mr. Lippman: In some ways, Architectural Digest is the quintessential modern magazine. It's beautiful. It's got the right audience. It makes absolutely no demands on its readers of any kind. It's kind of a fantasy book, if you will. It's a very productive, very enjoyable two or three hours a month.

Mr. Drexler: The future, I think, is the personalization of media. All media, including TV, will become more personal in nature, given the proliferation of channels and programmers, and VCRs. Magazines have been certainly one of the most personal media that exist. I think that strength has real value to advertisers.

Mr. Link: And in the '90s, this opportunity to leverage is going to be greater for magazines. Technology is driving everything, including media. Things like selective binding that are available now are going to enhance this personalized power. Broadcasters are going to have a tougher time, I believe, in leveraging technology, at least short term.

Mr. Ostrow: In selling magazines, the magazine industry cannot talk with one voice. Some tell you paid is more important, others tell you unpaid. Some tell you newsstand is the answer; others that subscriptions is the answer.

Mr. Drexler: That's right. There's got to be a common interest to sell the medium, to expound on the values of magazines.

Mr. Cole: You're doomed to fail if you think the right way is to sell against television.

Mr. Guthrie: MPA agrees. We haven't been on one of those kicks in four years. Now we're focusing on the editorial product, the quality of the reader. □

"With very large budgets, diminishing returns can set in, but we should be able to do our media job well regardless of budget size."
On buying options: "From the media-selection point of view, our job is to be as innovative as we can. Many media buys are necessarily made before the creative. Sometimes we don't even see the creative before we have to do our media job, but we can't let that limit our abilities in media decisions."
How he started: Worked in network media for 15 years prior to joining WRG, where he says he has been "a long time." His first account in advertising was General Electric.

So, Mr. and Ms. media buyer and planner, you're getting a bad rap for not being in your job long enough to really become an expert for wanting to move on to other things. Try asking your critics how long they wanted to stay in their entry-level jobs.

Almost 70% of you say you've been a buyer or planner for less than three years. But just because you haven't been in the position that long doesn't mean you're just biding your time until something better comes along: 30.1% of you saying you're apt to stay in the agency media business for the duration of your career.

Those of you who plan to leave agency media work are most likely staying in media, but heading to the client side. The next most common response was to jump to the selling side of the table.

Money seems to be the motivator. One planner in a Detroit-area shop asked the following rhetorical question: "Did you know the professionals in the media department are the lowest paid in any agency's structure? I can't wait to become a sales rep."

But those critics who think you're planning and buying media just to put food on the table until Hollywood calls should note only 18.9% of you want to get out of media, advertising and marketing altogether. It certainly appears you are the future of the advertising/marketing industry.

Account: U.S. Army Recruiting Command

Radio spending: Jan.-Sept. 1989: $4.7 million; Jan.-Sept. 1988: $4.6 million

On spending shifts: "We are downsizing our budgets with the reduction in defense spending, and making decisions about media accordingly. The differences in totals spent recently are just a shift in budget."

On why he buys radio: "If we must use TV less, we use radio as the most efficient medium to reach our audience.

"Network radio works well for us. It's a great frequency builder, has a positive effect on reach and with it we're able to get to our primary target audience, men ages 18-24. Radio does deliver the 18-to-24 year olds."

On entering the business: After a tour of duty as a Pentagon public affairs officer, he took a seven-month training session at Ogilvy & Mather, Chicago.

Account: Beef Industry Council

Radio spending: Jan.-Sept. 1989: $6.3 million; Jan.-Sept. 1988: $3.2 million

On managing a big budget: "I don't think of it as an enormous amount of money to spend, but all the things you can do with it does make the selection process more difficult.

"In this day of more media choices and a more fragmented marketplace it is very difficult to spend your dollars effectively. And the Beef Industry Council is pushing closer to $30 million annually on promotion, now spending in the $25 million-to-$26 million range."

On spending increases: "Network radio spending goes up during the pre-Memorial Day-to-post-Labor Day period because of our summer grilling promotion, especially for chuck cuts."

However, magazine spending will be getting the big push, she says. "There is more opposition to meat in the diet, we realize. We have put more and more dollars into print because the nutrition message is more complex and has to be explained in detail."

First media job: Started in the media department at Bozell, Chicago, followed by a tour at J. Walter Thompson USA, Chicago.

Cotter & Co., Chicago

Account: True Value Hardware Stores

Network radio spending: Jan.-Sept. 1989: $10.7 million; Jan.-Sept. 1988: $12.0 million

On spending decreases: "Our spending is off slightly in network radio because we've shifted some dollars within the radio category, out of the large AM networks and into some newer FM outlets with younger demographics.

"We wanted to do a better job of targeting women 25-35. In both cases we're reaching for the first-time homeowner, prime customers for True Value.

"Also, because we're a dealer-owned co-operative, we're always seeking the broadest means for advertising our growing product line —we need to cover many bases.

"At the same time, we definitely look at all the players in media.

Agencies meet changes head-on

After string of cuts, many see growth ahead

By Laura Loro

Torn by changes brought by merger mania, belt-tightening and the increasingly powerful role of computers in media decisions, media departments at many top agencies have cut staff and restructured their hierarchies.

Media departments, however, were no strangers to change.

"In years past, media people were in the back room, they were technicians and they weren't visible," says Michael Widener, senior VP-media director at AC&R, New York. "Today's media person has to be presentable, intelligent, well spoken."

While most media directors queried by Advertising Age say their departments have trimmed back personnel in recent years, many agree their departments will grow rather than shrink as marketing problems increasingly are addressed with solutions based on the media buy.

"Finding today's customer will be the starting point first to tailor the creative," says Page Thompson, exec VP-media director, DDB Needham Worldwide, New York. "Media will even lead the process. In five years you'll see an explosion in media. It is the ideal time to get into it."

Here's how media departments at some U.S. agencies are dealing with industry changes.

Foote, Cone & Belding: Business up, staff down

Business at this Chicago-based agency is heavier than five years ago, but the size of the media department has shrunk.

FCB's media department in Chicago employs 78 staffers, down from 109 five years ago. At the same time, billings have grown about 70.5% since 1985, to $669 million projected for '90.

"We have fewer people working smarter—that's an effect of computerization," says Roger Baron, VP-director of media research.

"Belt tightening is possible because of the computer."

What remains, Mr. Baron says, are staffers who spend more time analyzing, rather than just crunching, numbers. "We can look at over 100 different alternatives in a media plan to select one that is the best. In the past, we looked at five or 10 and more obvious ones. Some of the subtleties were lost," Mr. Baron says.

AC&R, New York: Fewer people, longer hours

Fewer people are doing more work and doing it later each day at AC&R, says Michael Widener, senior VP-media director at the New York agency.

"Our media planners today are working nights—it's almost routine now, whereas that wasn't the case" two years ago, he says, blaming the changes on belt-tightening.

"As billings have increased and as sophistication has increased, departments haven't kept pace. Even if you take inflation, there are so many fewer people per million dollars of billings."

DDB Needham Worldwide: A matter of evolution

Major changes were made in this agency's media department recently, but not because of belt-tightening or mergers, says Page Thompson, exec VP-media director at the New York shop.

Changes in the media landscape, such as fragmentation and clutter, forced Needham to redesign its media unit, he says.

"We are trying to change the whole media process and how it has been done in the last 10 to 20 years," Mr. Thompson says.

position is not as powerful as you do. Only 26.8% of media sellers say your slot is the most important link in the media buying process. Compare this with the 67.7% of your fellow buyers/planners–and 33.4% of media directors–who think planner/buyer is the most crucial cog in the wheel.

Where you may command the clout, however, is when a new media property is attempting to have its day in the media department court. Both you and media sellers say the job of evaluating new media vehicles falls on your desk.

Most of your bosses don't agree.

In comments, a few planners and buyers complained about a recurring Catch-22. From one planner at a major New York shop: "Media planners are charged with finding more creative media vehicles and ideas, yet have more and more work to do and therefore don't have the time to really think about new ideas."

To be an effective media buyer and planner, you need:
A) A passing knowledge of eighth-grade math
B) A multi-function calculator
C) 10 fingers with which to count.
D) None of the above
E) All of the above

We cheated. The correct answer is both D and E, because the job requires those elements listed and much more.

A rudimentary knowledge of math and an awareness of how to calculate CPMs and GRPs won't do the trick, as buying and planning media becomes more numbers oriented. Media directors were the only group surveyed to say crunching numbers is not more critical, although the opinion was far from unanimous.

In an interesting new twist, media buying and planning also is becoming more content oriented as the program-watching, product-boycotting Terry Rakoltas of this day and age have their say.

The ability to judge media properties on a social/emotional level is becoming just as important as watching the numbers, according to all groups surveyed.

can draw is that this is effectively a ban on 15-second ads," said Stephen Lambright, VP-group executive at Anheuser-Busch. About 5% of A-B's ad volume is made up of 15-second spots.

That argument failed to sway Sen. Gore. When told the proposed 20-word warning within a 15-second spot would leave barely enough time for a brand or corporate name, he replied, "Regardless, they should be accompanied by a statement of risk."

The ad industry is united on one point: The legislation will hurt radio and TV advertising.

Peter Moore, president of the Radio Network Association, said the measure represented "media discrimination" against radio.

"Print is visual, and you can do a fancy disclaimer in the background," he said. "TV could do different things. But in radio, sound is it."

He also said beer and wine ads are absent from most radio formats because a significant portion of their listeners are underage.

Mr. Moore said required disclaimers in ads for auto rebates, financing plans and some airline fares have already driven some advertisers from the medium.

If enacted, the Gore-Kennedy legislation could force alcohol advertising off TV along with radio, said Jim May, VP at the National Association of Broadcasters.

"The real effect of such a labeling system for broadcasters will be to discourage advertising," Mr. May said. "Further, there is no scientific evidence to support the notion that advertising causes alcohol abuse."

Although Sen. Gore said the legislation is aimed at helping the "one in 10 persons who abuse alcohol," John Kamp, VP at the American Association of Advertising Agencies, alleged that alcohol abusers "just may not be the people who watch TV programs with beer ads."

It's government by bumper sticker," said Miller Brewing Co.'s Richard Klemp, director of governmental affairs.

"There is a legitimate issue of drunken driving, but it seems like alcohol is always a scab that can be kicked and picked," he said. "If it is [their] intention to address fetal alcohol syndrome, then we disagree on approach. Miller never uses advertising to recommend pregnant women drink. Advertising has been to get beer drinkers to drink Miller brands."

"It's government by bumper sticker. There is a legitimate issue of drunken driving, but it seems like alcohol is always a scab that can be kicked and picked."

Peter Seremet, VP-public affairs at Heublein, said his company is monitoring the legislation but declined to say whether it would oppose the measure.

However, Mr. Seremet said, health warnings in ads are not "the best way to communicate the potential for abuse of products. We've reached a point where there's a credibility problem; does anyone read them?"

Heublein, marketer of Smirnoff vodka and Jose Cuervo tequila among other brands, previously opposed legislation that took effect Nov. 18, 1989, requiring health warnings on alcoholic beverage containers.

Wally Snyder, exec VP at American Advertising Federation, argued that ads are the wrong place for government warnings.

"We are concerned that this legislation is a clear departure from longstanding federal policy" that a product label is the appropriate spot for warning information, he said.

Association of National Advertisers Exec VP Dan Jaffe also questioned the proposed placement of lengthy warnings on outdoor ads.

"Billboards just can't have a lot of words," he said. "If someone is driving along, it's kind of difficult to read while driving past, or to stop to read."

The proposed advertising restrictions may run into some headwinds as early as next week, when the National Commission Against Drunk Driving may release a summary of its 16-month study.

John Grant, the commission's program director, said the report will make no recommendations to restict or modify alcohol ads. The commission is the non-governmental descendant of the Presidential Commission on Drunk Driving established in 1983 by President Reagan. Its membership ranges from prohibitionist groups to the Beer Institute.

The legislation now goes to committees in both chambers, where it will be scheduled for hearings. But neither Sen. Gore nor Rep. Kennedy could say whether committee hearings would be held this year. □ last year, in which 39% of 1,001 adults questioned said they favor prohibition of beer advertising (AA, June 5).

In last week's survey, slightly more than 54% said warnings would have "some effect" on consumption; another 6% said they would have "great effect."

Thirty-six percent said warnings would have "no effect at all."

Having an "effect" on consumption presumably means reducing it, but the question wasn't specific.

In comparison with other age segments, the youngest people surveyed agree the most with the idea that warnings would affect consumption.

Nearly 70% of 18-to-24-year-olds said the warnings would have an effect, including 12% who said warnings would have great effect.

People 35 to 44 years old are the least likely to agree; 56% of them said warnings would affect consumption.

Overall, 66% of those questioned said they were aware of proposals to attach health warnings to alcoholic beverage advertising.

Christian Roome, a Gallup analyst, said that percentage is probably higher than the true percentage because people typically don't like to admit being unaware of an issue.

Of those surveyed, 38% said they drink alcohol either "frequently" or "occasionally," while 62% said they "rarely" or "never" drink.

Half of the men said they drink frequently or occasionally; 27% of the women responded likewise.

Not surprisingly, support for warnings is highest among those who said they rarely drink (79% in favor) or never drink (76%) and lowest among those who said they drink frequently (64%).

In terms of education, support for warning labels is also lowest (67%) among those with less than 12 years of schooling and highest (82%) among those with "some college" education.

The breakdown by education level isn't consistent, however: A relatively low 68% of those describing themselves as college graduates—or about the same percentage as those with fewer than 12 years of schooling—said they support warning labels.

Those with less education are more likely to favor a ban on alcoholic beverage ads, the survey found. Some 44% of those who said they have fewer than 12 years of schooling said they favor a ban, vs. 36% of those with at least a high school education.

The poll found support for warnings to be generally the same across the country, though slightly higher in the West, where 76% of respondents said they favored warnings vs. 73% in each of the three other geographical areas —East, North Central and South Central.

People who make more money are more likely to oppose an ad ban.

Of those who said they make $75,000 or more a year, 65% said they oppose a ban, compared with fewer than half of those with incomes less than $75,000. □

Anti-smoking bill draws opposition

By Steven W. Colford

WASHINGTON—The attempt by U.S. Sen. Ted Kennedy (D., Mass.) to let states regulate—and even prohibit—tobacco advertising has encountered significant opposition from the senator's colleagues, sources say.

Ad and tobacco groups have criticized the proposal as unconstitutional. The bill also would create a $50 million, government-funded anti-tobacco ad campaign.

Legal scholars argued against the bill, apparently with some effectiveness, at last week's hearing before the Senate Labor & Human Resources Committee chaired by Sen. Kennedy.

After noted First Amendment attorney Floyd Abrams argued that the bill was overly restrictive and probably unconstitutional, Sen. Paul Simon (D., Ill.) asked whether removing the state regulation provision would appease the ad groups and solve constitutional concerns. Mr. Abrams said he thought so, and industry representatives later said they were optimistic their argument would prevail.

Other committee members expressing concern about the same provision were Sens. Christopher Dodd (D., Conn.) and Orrin Hatch (R., Utah), industry officials said.

A Kennedy aide said a vote on the measure could come as early as April 25.

"It's a ban in sheep's clothing," said Association of National Advertisers Exec VP Dan Jaffe.

He said letting states determine tobacco ad regulations would so impair any national marketing effort that marketers would be forced to stop advertising rather than comply with as many as 50 sets of regulations.

Mr. Abrams was joined in opposing the legislation by Morton Halperin, American Civil Liberties Union director, and Burt Neuborne, Columbia University law professor who appeared on behalf of the Freedom to Advertise Coalition. □

Adapt, broadcasters told

By Wayne Walley

ATLANTA—Advertisers are redefining media, and it's up to broadcasters to adjust to the needs of marketers.

That was the message Donald Keough, president of Coca-Cola Co., brought to last week's National Association of Broadcasters convention here.

"More advertisers are looking toward 'non-traditional' media such as cable, videos, theaters, special inserts in magazines and increased presence in places and events with high visibility," Mr. Keough said in his NAB presentation.

"We are looking for media options that are most focused to specific demographics or lifestyle segments of the consumer audience," he said.

In a separate panel discussion at the convention, ceos from ABC, CBS and NBC emphasized that ad revenue alone won't be enough to ensure network TV's ability to offer the best programming.

Robert Wright, NBC's president-ceo, said cable competitors ESPN and Turner Broadcasting System can generate enough money through subscriber fees to pay for their respective $450 million National Football League contracts to telecast Sunday night games.

"Advertising that comes in on those sought-after [Sunday night cable] packages is essentially free profit," Mr. Wright said. "The price on advertising can pretty much be anything when you don't have to cover substantial costs. Meanwhile, ABC, CBS and NBC struggle to get their money back."

Mr. Wright said the Big 3 are near the breaking point.

"We are looking for media options that are most focused to specific demographics or lifestyle segments of the consumer audience."

"We're more and more in an auction marketplace for shows," Mr. Wright said. "More and more, we are going to have to look seriously at passing things up."

A new bone of contention during the convention's panel discussion with the network chiefs was the current four-year limit on contracts between the networks and producers. This limit, the networks argue, invariably leads to massive payments to producers to keep a successful series going.

Citing NBC's recent negotiations to keep "The Cosby Show" —for a reported $2 million per episode license fee—the network leaders likened contract renewals to producers "pointing a gun to our heads."

"We pay the price," said Laurence Tisch, president-ceo of CBS Inc. "We have the worst of all worlds. We are allowed to lose money in the first years of a show and then not allowed to make money when a show does work."

The current system, the networks argue, leaves them at a competitive disadvantage.

"In my opinion, it's an unhealthy business where you put up 80% to 90% of the cost of a new show, get two runs, and then you don't have any [financial] interest," said Thomas Murphy, chairman-ceo, Capital Cities/ABC.

The Big 3 networks announced at the meeting that they'd formed the Network Television Association specifically to express the value of network TV to major advertisers and ad agencies.

"We're going to do everything possible to enhance the value of what we've created," Mr. Wright said.

Peter Chrisanthopoulos was named president-chief operating officer of the new organization. He most recently held the same title at the now-defunct RJR Nabisco Broadcast. □

Heileman sets bank deal

Debt restructuring could save No. 5 brewer

By Ira Teinowitz

G. Heileman Brewing Co., the nation's No. 5 brewer, is close to signing an accord with its debt holders that will keep the marketer afloat.

The agreement will enable the company to increase ad and promotional spending, company executives said, though it will be accompanied by cost-cutting measures affecting the brewer's agency compensation and event sponsorship strategies.

Heileman President-CEO Murray S. Cutbush told Advertising Age last week the banks have decided their chances for recovering funds are much improved by letting Heileman continue to market beer, rather than by selling off major parts of the company at, perhaps, bargain prices.

Instead of moving to liquidate the financially troubled brewer, several major banks will take an equity position in Heileman, company executives said.

The deal includes a commitment to ad spending, said Ian Crichton, senior exec VP-marketing and sales.

The restructuring of the bank loans "will put Heileman on a viable financial footing to continue into the future."

Heileman intends to pare its agency roster from five shops to one or two, a move that prompted Young & Rubicam, Chicago, to resign earlier this month. Concerns about Heileman's level of future media support were a major factor in Y&R's decision.

Consultants hired by Heileman as part of its bank negotiations recommended renewed marketing spending and the agency consolidation and review, sources said.

The financial pressures on Heileman stem from Australian entrepreneur Alan Bond's 1987 acquisition of the brewery for $1.2 billion. A syndicate of banks, led by the Bank of Boston, the Bank of Nova Scotia and the Pittsburgh National Bank, reportedly hold as much as $800 million in loans for that purchase.

Beer industry sources put Heileman's total worth at $250 million to $350 million.

The banks' earlier agreement to grant

Reebok laces up with Hill Holliday

STOUGHTON, Mass.—Reebok International today will name Hill, Holliday, Connors, Cosmopulos, Boston, to handle its $40 million U.S. athletic-shoe account, formerly at Chiat/Day/-Mojo, New York, sources said.

Reebok began notifying five contenders on Friday of its decision, but Bernadette Mansur, a Reebok spokeswoman, wouldn't confirm or deny the selection. She labeled word of the choice as "speculation."

Ms. Mansur said a single agency would handle Reebok's entire account, interpreted by sources as a sign Reebok's $15 million international account, recently awarded to Chiat, would be pulled in favor of a global campaign.

Hill Holliday lost to Chiat in a 1987 pitch and was considered an early favorite this time (AA, Feb. 5) despite Chiat's re-entry.

The winner's creative presentation and location, and the close relationship between agency President-CEO Jack Connors and Reebok Chairman-CEO Paul Fireman were cited as reasons for the selection.

Hill Holliday has developed a new umbrella positioning campaign for Reebok, as well as a separate spot for the Pump, its inflatable basketball shoe.

Chiat had its share of controversy on the account. A failed "U.B.U." campaign of 1988 was pulled quickly and replaced by another short-lived effort themed "The physics behind the physique." More recently, a spot depicting bungee jumpers wearing Reebok and

California's ad attack on tobacco marketers draws fire from stations

By Bradley Johnson

California's well-financed and boldly creative attack on the cigarette industry is running into trouble right out of the blocks.

TV stations in the state's top two markets are refusing to run the initial spots, part of what's said to be the biggest anti-smoking effort since the federal government required all broadcasters to run free anti-smoking ads in the late 1960s.

Two Capital Cities/ABC-owned stations, KABC-TV in Los Angeles and KGO-TV in San Francisco, have rejected "Industry Spokesman," the most controversial commercial in the state government's anti-smoking campaign.

The spot portrays cigarette executives as plotting ways to attract new smokers to replace those who've quit or died.

"We felt it was inflammatory," said Georgia Seid-Enseki, KABC director of broadcast standards and practices. "Ash-canning the competition has never been acceptable."

KPIX-TV, the CBS affiliate in San Francisco, has rejected the entire campaign because it wouldn't give in to the state's request for public service time equal to half of what the state bought in paid time.

"I just had a major, major problem with somebody with a cash commitment trying to influence our public service time,"

■ Anti-smoking ad doesn't sit well with Bob Garfield—Page 70.

said Kennen Williams, KPIX general sales manager. "To allow cash to influence our public service programming is not in ours or the viewers' best interest."

Executives at Keye/Donna/Pearlstein, the Los Angeles agency that created the TV and radio campaign for the California Department of Health Services, said they were unaware of any problems getting their spots on the air.

But Chairman Paul Keye—whose agency is known for its "Fried Egg" spot for the Media-Advertising Partnership for a Drug-Free America—seems determined to go from the frying pan into the fire.

"It would break my heart" if the ads had appeared without garnering any attention or controversy, Mr. Keye said. "We're

Stock deal unites WRG and BDDP

By Jon Lafayette

J. Boulet

K. Olshan

NEW YORK—Mary Wells Lawrence stepped down as ceo of Wells, Rich, Greene late last week, but not before her agency formed a global "union" with Paris-based BDDP.

Kenneth Olshan, 56, named to succeed the legendary Mrs. Lawrence, 61, as chairman of the board and ceo, said BDDP Holdings has agreed to buy a 40% stake in WRG.

Mr. Olshan and BDDP Holdings Chairman Jean Claude Boulet declined to discuss the purchase price, but industry executives estimated the price of the stake in WRG at $90 million to $100 million.

The management group at WRG, in turn, will get a 30% to 40% stake in BDDP Holdings through stock purchases at an undisclosed price, exchanges of shares and stock options, said Mr. Olshan, who keeps his current title of chairman-ceo at the WRG/Worldwide ad agency.

The deal creates what the principals are calling a worldwide "union" of agencies with billings of $2.2 billion and gives BDDP a long-sought presence in the U.S.

Mr. Boulet will be on the board of WRG; Mr. Olshan will be vice chairman of BDDP Holdings.

Mrs. Lawrence retains the titles of chairman and founder of WRG.

BDDP, founded in 1984, is a well-regarded creative agency with billings of $1.4 billion and revenues of $300 million from advertising, marketing services, corporate communication and human resources. The agency has wholly owned operations in seven European countries, plus a 20% interest in Singapore-based Batey Communications.

Mr. Olshan said the two agencies share Hertz Corp. as a client and that the union will conform to the conflict policies of WRG's clients. WRG works for Procter & Gamble Co., Ford Motor Co. and Sun Co., while BDDP works for Reckitt & Colman, BMW and British Petroleum.

The WRG/BDDP union will be governed by a six-person executive committee that will cross-refer clients, decide conflict policies and share technologies, Mr. Olshan said.

BDDP came close to a merger with Chiat/Day, Venice, Calif., four years ago before that shop became Chiat/Day/Mojo, and last year launched a hostile takeover of Boase Massimi Pollitt, London. Omnicom Group later acquired BMP.

The deal also comes at a key juncture for WRG, which needed to find cash to reduce Mrs. Lawrence's ownership stake.

At the same time, the move allows WRG to gain sorely needed international capability without losing control of its operation.

Although Mrs. Lawrence no longer controls a majority of WRG, she said she remains the largest stockholder among the management group.

In "passing the baton" to Mr. Olshan, Mrs. Lawrence said: "Wells, Rich, Greene is at the stage where it needs a full-time ceo on cite. Ken deserves the opportunity."

She said she will continue to act as "spirit guide and compulsive nagger. They'll never get rid of me."

Mrs. Lawrence will continue to work out of the agency's New York office for four months of the year and work from her various residences the rest of the year.

With only a minority stake in a London shop, WRG is the largest U.S.-only agency at $860 million in billings. Mr. Olshan acknowledged the agency's lack of an international arm has caused frustrations with both current clients and new-business prospects.

Mr. Olshan said joining BDDP was attractive because each of BDDP's agencies "is a strong local entity with experienced, successful, home-grown management." □

Cont'l axes O'Donnell

By Jennifer Lawrence

Continental Airlines last week fired Senior VP-Marketing James O'Donnell, the executive reportedly instrumental in the company's recent selection of Wells, Rich, Greene, New York.

The Texas Air Corp. unit said officially that Mr. O'Donnell "left to pursue other interests," but insiders said his departure wasn't voluntary.

Mr. O'Donnell, a Texas Air marketing veteran of almost two decades, wouldn't comment.

Sources said they were unsure what precipitated Mr. O'Donnell's dismissal, but insiders pointed to friction with John Nelson, Continental exec VP-marketing. Mr. Nelson apparently delivered the news to Mr. O'Donnell April 12 and asked him to leave that same day.

Mr. Nelson was unavailable for comment.

The firing comes just as WRG comes on board to reshape Continental's image. N W Ayer, New York and Houston, was abruptly terminated in late January on the $40 million-to-$50 million account.

WRG was said to be Mr. O'Donnell's choice while Mr. Nelson, at least initially, favored Lintas:New York. Lintas, the finalist in the review, is agency for Eastern Airlines, another Texas Air unit. Mr. Nelson had been a marketing executive at Eastern until 18 months ago.

"WRG will have to win over John Nelson," said an agency source close to the situation.

Three other sources said WRG's winning the Continental account was the "last straw" from Mr. Nelson's point of view.

"Jim flunked the loyalty test for the last time when he said that the agency he wanted was different from what Nelson wanted," said a former airline executive.

WRG late last week said it had learned of Mr. O'Donnell's exit but referred questions to Mr. Nelson.

The two executives were thought of as extreme opposites. Colleagues

"Jim flunked the loyalty test for the last time when he said that the agency he wanted was different from what Nelson wanted."

of both men describe Mr. O'Donnell, 48, as a "brilliant, intuitive, aggressive, flamboyant" marketer and Mr. Nelson, 47, as a "level-headed and brilliant politician."

Mr. O'Donnell had been Texas Air's key marketing architect with direct access to company Chairman Frank Lorenzo.

The men first met in the late 1960s in New York, when Mr. O'Donnell was staff marketing VP for the now-defunct Mohawk Airlines and Mr. Lorenzo was with Jet Capital Corp. In 1972, when Mr. Lorenzo took over Texas International Airlines, he recruited Mr. O'Donnell to serve as marketing VP.

It was Mr. O'Donnell's loyalty and access to the entrepreneurial Mr. Lorenzo that prompted the more bureaucratic Mr. Nelson to fire his marketing subordinate, sources speculated.

They also said they believe Mr. O'Donnell's removal paves the way for a replacement from Eastern. Mr. Nelson is said to have close ties to George Brennan, Eastern's VP-marketing.

Mr. Brennan couldn't be reached for comment.

Eastern faces an uncertain future as it struggles under federal bankruptcy protection. Industry talk has focused on a merger of Eastern into Continental, though Texas Air has denied such a plan.

Industry observers said they expect to see Continental turn to a more traditional marketing approach under Mr. Nelson. In the past, it's often taken a creative approach to selling seats.

Two years ago, a Continental ad campaign urged customers to leave the country April 15 to avoid paying taxes. The effort prompted the Internal Revenue Service to revise its rule that permitted an automatic filing extension for those not in the U.S. on tax return day.

Mr. O'Donnell has been fired by Continental once before—in late 1982, after Stephen M. Wolf was named president-chief operating officer. Mr. O'Donnell at that point was VP-marketing services.

After Mr. Wolf left Continental in 1983, Mr. O'Donnell was named president of Scali, McCabe, Sloves, Houston, then Continental's agency. He returned to Continental as VP-marketing in 1985. □

Swedish marketers going global

Ikea's success worldwide showed them 'the impossible is possible'

By Seth Chandler

STOCKHOLM—A new generation of Swedish consumer goods companies is following furniture marketer Ikea's lead into the international marketplace.

"I get a lot of inspiration from Ikea, because they have proved that the impossible is possible," said George Kittel, international marketing director for Pogen, Sweden's largest family-owned baking company.

Sweden isn't known as the home of a great many internationally recognized brand names, and some companies choose not to trade on their Swedish culture.

"Big companies like Electrolux don't give a damn about being Swedish or prefer not to be seen as Swedish," Mr. Kittel said.

It's not surprising then that Ikea has become a role model for companies such as Pogen, Ramlosa, Zoegas Kaffe and H&M Hennes & Mauritz.

Since Ikea entered Denmark in 1969, the company has been seeking to attract business outside Sweden. Last year, 72% of the company's $2.7 billion in sales came from the 20 countries outside Scandinavia where Ikea goods are marketed.

Ikea spends about half its estimated $70 million annual marketing budget on 27 different catalogs, produced in-house in 12 languages.

Its first U.S. store opened in Philadelphia in 1985; there are now Ikea stores in Washington, Pittsburgh and Baltimore as well, with stores opening in New York and Burbank, Calif., this year. Deutsch, New York, handles the $7 million U.S. account.

All Ikea stores are painted in the colors of the Swedish flag, blue and yellow, and the company emphasizes its roots by naming new designs after Scandinavian rivers, lakes, trees and towns.

"Ikea is not just selling Swedish furniture; it's selling Swedish lifestyle," Mr. Kittel said.

Pogen, with worldwide sales last year of $270 million, began selling cookies in the U.S. in 1969.

Until this year, its U.S. focus had been on vending machines, where it's become the No. 3 supplier of cookies, said Kathy O'Brien, national sales manager, Pogens Family Bakery, Compton, Calif.

In January, Pogens began rolling out a line of 14 cookies into supermarkets in 11 Western and Midwestern markets; additional expansion, possibly on the East Coast, is planned for 1991, Ms. O'Brien said. She wouldn't disclose sales figures.

Pogens runs newspaper ads with coupons to support the line in the U.S. Advertising and promotions are handled in-house.

Zoegas, a Nestle subsidiary, is also moving West. The premium coffee marketer began selling in the U.S. via a mail-order test last November and offers whole bean and ground varieties of Rut Pa Skaret Rost, Sofiero Palace Rost, and Mollberg's Rost flavors.

Direct mail and ads in Food & Wine and Travel & Leisure support; Krupp/Taylor, Los Angeles, is the agency.

By yearend, Zoegas will decide whether to expand in the U.S.

"We are a very small company. We have to be careful," said Ann Katrin Bergsten, international marketing director.

Another company aiming for greater international awareness is Ramlosa, the leading Swedish mineral water. Ramlosa is trying to take advantage of Sweden's reputation for purity, health and cleanliness, said Anna Montelius, assistant export manager.

Ramlosa's advertising refers to the brand's Swedish origins, and the logo appears in the original Swedish typography.

BSB Sweden here and ASL/Alliance, London, handle Ramlosa, which spends about $8.3 million annually in advertising worldwide, about half of that contributed by distributors.

At home, Ramlosa holds a 35% share of the $70 million market (at wholesale). Ramlosa also dominates the mineral water market in Denmark and is a major player in Finland, Norway and the Middle East.

In other markets, Ramlosa is focusing on the hotel and restaurant business because of higher margins.

"Our overall concern is the price structure," said Roland Bengtsson, managing director. "No one makes money in the U.S., Canada or the U.K. in the supermarket trade."

Ramlosa has spotty distribution in U.S. supermarkets and delis.

Sales have quadrupled in the past decade to $33 million in 1989, but foreign sales account for less than 25% of the total. The tougher-than-expected going in the U.S. and U.K. has held total exports to $5 million to $6 million.

H&M Hennes & Mauritz has also been expanding its line of popularly priced women's and men's clothing stores beyond Sweden's borders. Although there are no plans to enter the U.S., the company expects to add 25 to 30 more stores this year, for a total of 275 outlets in Europe.

Hennes has stores in Norway, Denmark, the Netherlands, U.K., West Germany and Switzerland.

With worldwide ad spending of an estimated $35 million, the chain aims to project an image of a low-cost marketer of "expendable fashion," mostly casual separates.

"The idea is that you can buy a lot of fashion, change a lot and have fun," said Hugues Goulin, a Hennes project leader in this titleless company.

Colors, sizes and some styles are adapted for each market.

"Scandinavians are very fond of blue. Germans like to flash more with their colors. In England, black is always big. Scandinavians are taller; Swiss are shorter," Mr. Goulin explained. "German men wear a lot more blazers. In Scandinavia, it's more fashionable to wear outdoor jackets, but in England, they wear heavy woolen coats."

Swedish marketers, such as Hennes & Mauritz department store (above) and Ramlosa bottled water, bring the clean look of their ads across the Atlantic.

Unlike the clothing, Hennes advertising has the same distinctive look in every country.

It "is clean, less is more, with nothing to distract," Mr. Goulin said of the white background layouts.

"The focus is on the clothes," he said. All art is produced in Sweden because the minimalist look is "difficult to get right without looking cheap," he said. Hennes works with three Stockholm agencies: Aggerborgs for its adult ads; Rififi for youth advertising; and Mansson & Nord for ads for cosmetics sold in the company's stores and for advertising at two other smaller, domestic clothing chains owned by Hennes.

Although copy and media are handled by small local agencies in each country, there's little room for deviation. Copy typically gives only the name of the product and the price. □

Haircare lines tout salon connections

By Pat Sloan

Shampoos, conditioners and styling aids increasingly are getting the salon treatment.

Sales of salon-related brands in mass-market stores grew 8% last year. And that $650 million retail segment is attracting new players and inspiring current competitors to introduce new products and increase marketing support.

Growth was even more impressive for salon products sold to consumers in salons. In 1989, these brands, representing close to $1 billion in business, by various industry estimates grew anywhere from 12% to 25%.

Sales of haircare products in food and drugstore outlets totaled $2.7 billion last year.

Top five professional haircare brands

(sold in salons to consumers)

1. Nexxus	$200 million
2. Redken	$140 million
3. Paul Mitchell	$100 million
4. Matrix	$75 million
5. Sebastian	$60 million

Source: Industry estimates

Credibility is the big advantage for salon-related brands, said Cody Dalton, president of Jose Eber Inc.

"What a salon provides that a Finesse can never provide is the individual who has the authority to deliver the message. It's like a salon in a bottle," she said.

Three salon-positioned brands sold at mass market—Eber, Playtex Family Products' La Coupe and Condition by Clairol—this year are slated for advertising and promotional programs valued at $20 million each.

The Eber line is handled by Altschiller Reitzfeld Davis/-Tracy-Locke, New York, while Margeotes Fertitta & Weiss is La Coupe's agency and Laurence, Charles, Free & Lawson handles Condition.

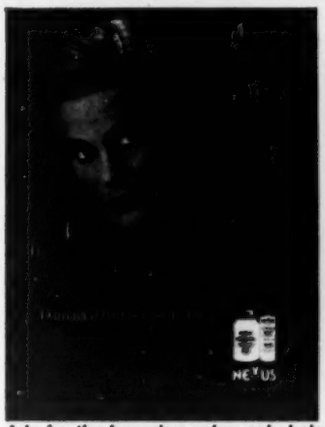
In 1988, Condition received barely $4 million and Eber's measured media support was less than $1 million, reported LNA/Arbitron Multi-Media Service. La Coupe didn't even register on the measured-media charts.

Eber is a joint venture between hair stylist Jose Eber and Meshulam Riklis. La Coupe was created by salon owner Charles Booth in 1983. Both ended up in the mass market, positioning themselves competitively against retail brand names like Procter & Gamble Co.'s Vidal Sassoon, the first stylist to lend his salon authority to a mass-market brand.

Condition by Clairol has little actual salon heritage, though Clairol itself ranks among the leading suppliers of hair color to salons. So Condition brand managers try to reinforce a salon "image" through packaging and formulas. It's much the same tactic Helene Curtis Industries has used with its Salon Selectives line.

Eber has shot for a mass presence because "that's where the volume is," Ms. Dalton said.

Certainly, products can get a faster start in mass outlets than salons. In its first year out more than a decade ago, Sassoon, for instance, reportedly rocketed to $80 million in sales while it took 25 years for the No. 2 salon brand, Redken, to hit $100 million. But building that kind of volume in the mass market can be risky and expensive, and longevity isn't guaranteed.



Ads for the booming salon-only haircare segment, which includes Nexxus (l.) and Mastey, bank on the implicit endorsement salons give them.

As a result, some marketers are sticking to salons.

For example, former Minnetonka CEO Robert Taylor now is chairman of Graham Webb International, named for the British stylist and salon owner.

While at Minnetonka, Mr. Taylor built brands like Check-Up toothpaste and Calvin Klein's Obsession fragrance.

He said he sees haircare products sold to consumers through salons as a wide-open category because there are only "five dominant players, all non-public and all owned by entrepreneurs."

According to industry estimates, the top five are: Nexxus Products Corp. with $200 million in sales; Redken Laboratories with $140 million; Paul Mitchell, $100 million; Matrix, $75 million; and Sebastian, $60 million.

Mr. Taylor said part of the formula for a successful salon line is hooking up with an established name.

Mr. Webb, who's served as a spokesman for other salon lines in the U.S. and who in June will go to the Soviet Union to create a perestroika hair design, fits that bill, Mr. Taylor said.

Traditionally, salon lines haven't been advertised much because salons looked askance at consumer marketing.

"Consumer advertising, they felt, created a demand for diversion," the practice of independent companies using fraudulent methods to get products and reselling them to retailers, said Harris Shepard, ad manager for Mastey, a marketer of salon products.

But as salons have realized that advertising also helps them reach consumers, it has become more acceptable, said Mr. Shepard, whose company will use spot TV on a national basis for the first time this year. Ads are handled in-house.

Graham Webb uses upscale displays, videos and sampling for its new line. A regional $1.5 million campaign, handled in-house, breaks this month.

While most salon lines are handled in-house, Nexxus uses RAO Associates, Los Angeles. Among salon lines, Nexxus spends the most on advertising, more than $17 million in 1989.

This year marks the first time that Nexxus is using prime-time TV rather than just spot TV and print. □

Kids cologne line broadens

By Marcy Magiera

Kids William & Clarissa this month is introducing what it says is the most extensive line of personal-care products for children.

The extensive Kids line, now shipping to drugstores, supermarkets and mass merchandisers nationally, includes shampoo, conditioner, bubble bath, lotion, oil and colognes for boys and girls, plus powder, lip balm, liquid soap, bar soap and sunblock for infants and children to age 12.

In going up against Johnson & Johnson Baby Products Co. and other established product marketers, Kids William & Clarissa will be under the wing of President Mary George, 39, who is no stranger to creating new niches in the personal-care market.

As VP-marketing and, later, president-chief operating officer of VLI Corp., Ms. George guided the marketing campaign that made the Today sponge the No. 1 over-the-counter female contraceptive.

She joined Kids William & Clarissa last year after working as a marketing consultant.

Ms. George said that marketing the Kids line is similar to marketing the contraceptive, "in the sense that you're going into the same retail outlets and . . . you're marketing to women." The only difference is that VLI's customer was the "modern, upcoming woman," she said, while the woman who will buy Kids is "a little more upscale, more highly educated."

Print and direct-mail ads will appeal to affluent parents and grandparents by telling them the Kids products "come from people who are parents before they are manufacturers," she said.

Kids William & Clarissa, in fact, is named after the children of Chairman-CEO William A. Meyer.

The estimated $8 million ad campaign will start in May, when the company will send a direct-mail piece with a $1 coupon to 30 million mothers with children under 12. Print ads will break in June issues of women's and parenting magazines.

Ketchum Advertising, Los Angeles, handles.

The concept for the line was born in 1988, when the company began selling colognes for boys and girls in department stores in San Francisco and New York.

Last year, Mr. Meyer approached Ms. George with the idea of expanding the colognes into a complete line of toiletries for children.

"I knew the concept was fantastic, but I knew we could do much better at mass market," she said.

Kids William & Clarissa estimates the market for children's personal-care products to be about $350 million. □

Canon bets camcorders will be hot in summer

By Ira Teinowitz

Canon USA is betting camcorders have become so popular that traditional consumer electronics advertising rules can be tossed out the window.

In a move that flies in the face of industry wisdom, Canon tripled its budget for camcorder advertising and has begun a new $7 million to $8 million camcorder campaign this month rather than before the Christmas holiday season.

"We believe that camcorders are no longer seasonal items," said Mike Matzkin, manager of public relations for Canon. "They are year-round items."

Canon's ads spotlighting the new tiny E51 Canovision 8 camcorder (AA, April 9) are intended to make the company a major player in the U.S. camcorder market, Mr. Matzkin said.

Ads for Canon's E51 Canovision camcorder focus on its special features, such as low-light capability.

RCA, Panasonic and Sony brands are the three top-selling camcorders, each with about a 15% share of the $2.1 billion market last year, Television Digest reported.

Canon in 1988 was the No. 1 video camera maker among traditional film camera companies but still had only 1.4% of the market, said David Lachenbruch, editorial director of Television Digest. Figures for last year were still being calculated.

Four 15-second commercials have begun a nine-week flight in 10 top spot markets and on Cable News Network, Arts & Entertainment and Discovery cable channels.

The humorous spots also get a few network airings on CBS' Professional Golfers' Association coverage.

Half-page spreads in consumer magazines also tout Canon's noninterest credit card. DCA Advertising, New York, handles. ☐

Coffee sales climb in '89

By John C. Maxwell Jr.

Though dollar sales in the coffee industry rose slightly in 1989, adjusted per capita consumption continued to decline.

Marketers' emphasis on higher-priced, upscale, quality coffees may have helped to prop up sales, which rose 4% last year to an estimated $2.7 billion.

The specialty coffee subsegment has shown continued strength based on the increased availability of the higher-quality arabica coffee bean and consumers' apparent willingness to pay a little extra for a better cup of coffee.

Increased sales are also due in part to the renewed competitive battle for market share between General Foods USA's Maxwell House and Procter & Gamble Co.'s Folgers.

That rekindled share fight boosted coffee advertising and promotion substantially last year. A number of new-product introductions also increased spending.

Nevertheless, coffee consumption will remain flat or decline as consumers move away from hot, acidic drinks to cold beverages such as soft drinks. Historically, there's a direct correlation between coffee consumption and age, but that's expected to weaken as baby-boomers age and take their soft-drink habits with them.

Per capita consumption (based on a three-year moving average) declined modestly last year to an estimated 25.3 gallons, vs. 25.4 gallons in 1988 and 25.7 in 1987.

Market share estimates show P&G moving narrowly ahead of General Foods in the regular coffee segment, 32.2% to 32.1%. But General Foods continued its lead in instant coffee with a combined 36.7%, as second-place Nestle came in at 33.6% and P&G had 23.9%. ☐

A-B to ink $100M ESPN deal

By John McManus

Anheuser-Busch is about to sign a new five-year, $100 million-plus ad commitment to ESPN, the major sports cable network.

The move could have ramifications for the Big 3 TV networks, each of which is preparing to sell ad packages on sports programming purchased for record fees.

"We're working on a multiyear deal with ESPN that will take care of our involvement with their coverage of Major League Baseball and National Football League games, as well as other parts of their schedule," said Charles Fruit, VP-corporate media at Anheuser-Busch.

Mr. Fruit declined to elaborate, except to say the deal was "not quite done, but we hope to announce it soon."

ESPN officials confirmed negotiations had reached the final stage but wouldn't disclose terms.

Media executives familiar with the pact said A-B has committed to buying five or six units in all of ESPN's 170 baseball telecasts. The current pact, signed in 1985, runs through this year; however, the 1990 baseball season will be considered part of the new deal.

The units are priced at about $17,000 per 30-second spot on Sunday nights, $13,000 for Wednesday nights and $8,000 for Tuesday and Friday night doubleheaders.

A-B is also expected to have a dominant beer category position in ESPN's new package of NFL

PERRIER'S BACK

Whimsical campaign to support its return

By Patricia Winters

Perrier returns to the marketplace this week, facing one of the biggest marketing challenges in recent years—one that could make or break the brand in the U.S.

The marketer, Perrier Group, is using a deliberately whimsical ad and promotional blitz to bring back its sparkling water.

The company is hoping to erase any lingering doubts about the safety of the product, recalled from the market globally after traces of benzene, a carcinogen, were discovered.

"We recalled, we recycled, we publicly acknowledged we made a mistake," Ronald Davis, Perrier Group president-ceo, said in an interview at the company's serene Greenwich, Conn., headquarters. "We tried to be responsible."

"It's over," said Kim Jeffery, senior VP-marketing and sales. "In order to start to have some fun, we had to say what happened and say we're sorry. We did [that in March]. Now, we move on from that point."

Perrier's return:

New York	April 26
Miami	May 2
Baltimore/Washington	May 4
Los Angeles	May 8
Philadelphia	May 10
Boston	May 15
Chicago	May 22
San Francisco	May 24

Perrier hits shelves April 26 in New York, and after six weeks will be back in 90% of the U.S.

On the day each market is reentered, the company will start a two-week TV and newspaper campaign themed "We're back."

The TV commercials—the first since Waring & LaRosa, New York, won back the account from Hal Riney & Partners, San Francisco—are expected to use a fun-spirited variation of the famous "The earth's first soft drink" line, a source said.

In promotions, Perrier will conduct sampling in 15 top markets via portable "Perrier cafes," complete with staffers in "We're back" apparel.

These efforts are part of the Coke taps Host for marketing

By Patricia Winters

Coca-Cola USA has named an American Home Products Corp. executive as its senior VP-marketing, a post considered one of the toughest jobs in package-goods marketing.

Theodore J. Host, 44, now president of AHP's recently sold Boyle-Midway Household Products unit, assumes the Coca-Cola post May 1. The company has been searching to fill the top marketing post, formerly held by John C. Reid, for 18 months.

Reporting to Mr. Host will be Michael Beindorff, VP-marketing planning, and James Patton, head of marketing services. Mr. Beindorff is responsible for the company's $170 million soft-drink ad budget, as well as for brand planning, media and marketing research. Mr. Patton has responsibility for promotions, packaging and entertainment marketing.

Mr. Host's appointment isn't expected to spark any immediate changes within Coca-Cola's marketing structure or with its long-time agency relationships.

He will report to Coca-Cola USA President Ira C. Herbert, who's regarded as the company's top authority on all advertising and marketing functions.

T. Host

Executives close to Coca-Cola said Mr. Herbert will continue to have final say on all major advertising and promotion decisions.

"With Ike in charge, the organization will stay the way [he] likes to deal with it," said one executive close to Coca-Cola. "I don't foresee any major shakeup or realignment."

Said another executive: "Coca-

Financial review afoot

NEW YORK—A financial services company here with ad spending of $60 million to $100 million has contacted several shops with international capabilities through the search consultant Advertising Agency Register, agency sources said. The register has indicated to some agencies that credit card business could pose a conflict. Speculation among agency new-business sources centered on MasterCard International, now at Lintas:New York. Other sources named Citicorp, whose agencies include N W Ayer and Lowe Marschalk, both here, and Chicago-based Foote, Cone & Belding. Both companies denied they're looking for a new agency.

ABC yanks bungee ad

NEW YORK—ABC said it won't air Reebok's revised bungee-jumping spot again. The commercial ran on the network for the first time April 19 (see earlier story on Page 81). "We accepted the spot pending re-evaluation of consumer complaints. The viewers responded," an ABC spokeswoman said. "We don't discuss numbers, but it was a significant amount, enough to justify withdrawing the ad." CBS also ran a revised spot last week.

Big shift at Saatchi

Trio of top execs may move to operating units

By Laurel Wentz

LONDON—Saatchi & Saatchi Co. Chief Executive Robert Louis-Dreyfus is expected to announce next week new jobs for Jeremy Sinclair, Saatchi deputy chairman, and Roy Warman and Terry Bannister, joint ceos of the communications division.

The three men will be leaving their current jobs in the holding company to work at individual operating units, Saatchi sources said.

Saatchi won't reveal which executive will go where, but sources speculated that Mr. Sinclair is likely to go to Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising.

One of the other two men would go to Backer Spielvogel Bates Worldwide, and the other would look after the remaining Saatchi communications businesses, according to the speculation.

"The general feeling is there's a need to reduce central overhead costs and put the costs in the profit centers," said a source familiar with Saatchi.

Sources said Backer Chairman-CEO Carl Spielvogel is unlikely to welcome the addition of a top Saatchi executive to his company.

"Backer Spielvogel Bates and Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising are the only ones that can really afford more management," said a source familiar with Saatchi. "There are a lot of people to persuade. . . . It is contentious which ones they want [to work at] and which ones want them."

Sources estimated that Messrs. Warman and Bannister are each paid about $450,000 a year.

Messrs. Sinclair, Warman and Bannister were on vacation last week and couldn't be reached for comment.

All three are members of the Saatchi holding company's board, and it isn't clear whether reassignment would affect that. □

How Nissan pays Chiat

By Jon Lafayette

Nissan Motor Corp. USA is paying Chiat/Day/Mojo on a sliding scale ranging from an average 10% for the first $150 million in billings to 6% and less on additional spending.

The compensation arrangement, part of Nissan's overall agreement with Chiat, was obtained by Advertising Age last week.

The document was sent in an envelope to AA's Los Angeles office with no return address or cover letter. Ad Age has determined independently that the agreement appears to be authentic.

The three-year agreement, dated last Oct. 1, calls for Chiat to get a 12% commission on the first $50 million in spending, 10% on the next $50 million, 8% on the next $50 million, 6% on the next $50 million and 5% for any additional spending.

The Venice, Calif.-based agency gets those commission rates on media spending plus out-of-pocket expenses incurred servicing the account, including production costs. Agencies usually take a 16.75% markup on production costs.

The contract covers Nissan's national account; there's a separate agreement covering Chiat's work for Nissan's major dealer associations.

It couldn't be determined whether the new contract pays more or less commission than the previous contract.

Because of their sheer size—many carmakers spend more than $100 million with their agencies—auto accounts are among the agency industry's most profitable pieces of business even though commissions are low.

Nissan's arrangement with Chiat isn't uncommon. General Motors Corp. recently completed a five-year program that gradually cut agency commissions to 9% from 15% during the 1990 model year. During the same period, GM's U.S. media spending rose 69% to $960 million, LNA/Arbitron Multi-Media Service figures showed.

Chiat should be able to do well with Nissan, several agency executives said in response to questions about the contract's details.

At $150 million in billings, Chiat would collect $15 million in revenue. Industry executives estimated the agency should be able to generate a $2 million profit before taxes on the account annually based on spending at the $150 million rate.

Compensation was a controversial issue when Nissan was searching for a new agency in 1987 to replace William Esty Co., New York, and Nissan reportedly sweetened its inital compensation before awarding the account to Chiat.

One finalist, Ogilvy & Mather, dropped out of the review claiming it couldn't afford to take the account at the compensation levels proposed by consultant Alvin Achenbaum.

An O&M executive said Nissan

Viewer drop hits upfront

By Wayne Walley

NEW YORK—An unprecedented drop in the number of people watching TV during the first quarter of 1990 is about to turn the network upfront selling season upside down.

Industry sources expect the networks to initially ask for 8% to 12% increases this year, but many buyers say they will be hard-pressed to accept cost-per-thousand increases above 5%.

Last year, media buyers expected single-digit CPM increases in the upfront market and left paying hefty 10% to 17% increases over 1988 levels.

Nielsen Media Research figures show that the recently completed 1989-90 prime-time network TV season was the least watched in history. While fourth-quarter 1989 ratings were respectable, first quarter 1990 ratings plummeted.

"This impacts on projections for next year," said an agency source. "If the numbers hold true, buyers will balk at big network increases and will have to look at lower-price non-traditional media. You'll see a huge influx of money into the unwired networks, and some of the big guys might decide to shift money to the spot market."

"If the numbers hold true, buyers will balk at big network increases and will have to look at lower-price non-traditional media."

The Big 3 networks combined for an average 39.7 rating (percentage of U.S. households) and a 65 share (percentage of TVs in use) for the whole season, a 4% drop from last year, Nielsen said.

Should the data hold true, advertiser and agency executives say they will shift spending to other TV media unless the networks hold down price increases this year during the upcoming upfront negotiations, when advertisers buy network time as much as a year in advance.

Network officials attributed the ratings decline to depressed homes-using-television, or HUT, levels, which dropped to 60.1 from 61.5 last year, representing a loss of about 1.4 million TV households.

A HUT level is the percentage of the nation's 92.1 million TV households using television at a given time; ratings represent the percentage of U.S. TV households watching a specific program at the same time.

TV usage usually peaks during the first quarter, but this year HUT levels in prime time were off 2% while daytime dropped 7% and late-night 5%.

The February and March ratings decline was so severe that it forced the networks to provide advertisers with make-good units that have already chewed up tens of millions of dollars worth of inventory.

"This is causing people to tear

What do moviegoers think of ads?

By Scott Hume and Marcy Magiera

Warner Bros. last week chimed in with Walt Disney Co.'s claim that commercials in movie theaters drive people goofy. But an Advertising Age/Gallup Organization poll shows most moviegoers are much less animated on the issue.

GALLUP SURVEY

A national survey conducted by Gallup found opposition to cinema ads, though milder than what was reported by Disney when it started its ban last month.

Also, that opposition drops significantly if the alternative to cinema ads is higher ticket prices, the Ad Age/Gallup poll found.

Gallup surveyed 1,000 persons by phone in March and asked whether they had seen a movie in a theater during the previous three months. The 435 persons who said they had were asked additional questions about ads shown before the feature.

Of that group of moviegoers, 21% said they strongly favor a ban on in-theater ads; 23% said they favor a ban; 31% oppose a ban on ads; 4% strongly oppose a ban; and 21% were undecided.

The Gallup survey, which has a margin of error of plus or minus 3.1%, found sentiment against cinema ads stronger among men (46% of whom favor or strongly favor a ban) than women (42%).

Also, 50% of moviegoers ages 55 or older favor such a ban, vs. 40% of those ages 18 to 34.

Those who said they favor or strongly favor a ban on cinema ads were asked whether they would continue to favor a ban if it meant a 50¢ increase in the price of a ticket. Under that scenario, half this group said they wouldn't oppose being shown ads.

If a ban would mean a $1 increase, only 26% of the ad-opposition group said it would continue to resist. If they were faced with a $2 price increase, opposition shrank to 15% of the group.

Earlier this month, Disney released a survey of moviegoers it commissioned that found 90% of those interviewed opposed to being shown paid advertising in theaters.

Disney said the survey backed its February edict that theaters not show ads before movies distributed under its Disney, Touchstone Pictures or Hollywood Pictures banners (AA, Feb. 12).

Disney's survey, which interviewed in-person 18,772 moviegoers in 10 cities on March 31, was conducted by National Research Group, a Saatchi & Saatchi Co. subsidiary.

It found 95% of respondents in favor of seeing promotional trailers for upcoming movies. For non-film products, the strongest support—at 11% in favor—was for soft-drink commercials, followed by automobiles, 10%; beer, 8%; and newspapers and credit cards, tied at 5%.

The Ad Age/Gallup survey asked which cinema advertiser moviegoers had seen that first came to mind, and the sample's top vote getter was Coca-Cola/Coke, followed by Pepsi-Cola, concession stands, popcorn, the Los Angeles Times (which was the top vote getter among respondents in the West), American Express, Diet Pepsi, soft drinks in general, anti-drug ads and anti-smoking ads.

Nearly 6 of 10 persons (58%) who said they had been to a movie theater in the past three months were unable to recall a commercial they had seen.

Warner Bros., in becoming the second studio to prohibit movie theaters from showing on-screen commercials before its films, said its policy takes effect with the May 18 release of "Gremlins 2: The New Batch."

"We've never been in favor of [on-screen advertising]," said Barry Reardon, Warner Bros. president-domestic distribution. "Back in 1978, with the release of 'Superman,' we said we didn't wish it to be played" with ads but didn't really enforce the policy.

Disney declined to comment on the Warner Bros. policy. But in an interview last February, Richard Cook, president of Disney's Buena Vista Pictures Distribution unit, expressed hope that other studios would join with Disney and make the prohibition of on-screen ads an industry policy.

Exempted from both the Disney and Warner Bros. policies are theatrical trailers, slides projected during intermission and ads for approved charitable purposes.

Mr. Cook said "all [theater chains] across the country have now agreed" to honor Disney's policy.

United Artists Entertainment Co., which operates 2,600 of the approximately 17,500 first-run theater screens in the U.S., originally balked at Disney's dictum but acquiesced last month.

"We've said from the outset that, in terms of dollars, [on-screen ads] are not material," said John Neal, VP-corporate communications at UA.

The theater chain also will "comply with [the Warner Bros. policy] as far as we have to," Mr. Neal said.

The movie theaters may get a hand from the Federal Trade Commission. Hollywood sources say the FTC is looking into possible restraint of trade implications in the studios' ban on advertising before their films.

The U.S. Department of Justice also was considering an investigation of the matter, sources say, but in meetings between the two agencies it was determined FTC would handle it. □

Global ad buys in Ford's future

By Raymond Serafin

DETROIT—Global approaches to media buying and market research may be part of Ford Motor Co.'s future, said Edsel Ford II, executive director of Ford's marketing staff.

One possibility is that Ford will assign a single agency to negotiate worldwide media buys with companies that publish or broadcast internationally, Mr. Ford said last week during a meeting of the Automotive Press Association.

E. Ford

But "we're a long way away" from making a decision to go that route, he said.

The major international agencies for Ford are J. Walter Thompson Co., with responsibility for Ford advertising in 13 countries, including Ford Division in the U.S.; Young & Rubicam, with four Ford accounts in Europe and North America, including Lincoln-Mercury in the U.S.; and Ogilvy & Mather, with Ford assignments in 12 countries, including the Parts & Service Division in the U.S.

"There's going to be a day where maybe one advertising agency ... would be buying media globally," Mr. Ford said. "Time magazine publishes everywhere in the world, and Ford buys Time magazine everywhere in the world. Why don't we have one advertising agency go to Time in New York and say we want to make a global buy?" That, he said, is "one of the internal questions we're asking ourselves."

Although a global ad campaign isn't likely soon, Mr. Ford said a standardized approach to market research would help the automaker develop marketing strategies that cut across boundaries.

He's been urging the research companies that separately compile demographic and psychographic data on new-car buyers in the U.S. and Western Europe to standardize their approaches "so we can compare the tastes and wants of consumers."

Mr. Ford said a majority of auto sales growth during the next two decades will occur "in markets where most automakers have little or no presence today," including Eastern Europe, the Soviet Union and Asian countries such as India and Indonesia. Joint ventures between automakers to design, build and market vehicles in various countries will become even more commonplace, he said. □

Nike joins literacy fight

An Advertising Age roundup

Nike last week became the most recent recruit in the fight against illiteracy and for keeping kids in school, joining ranks with Adolph Coors Co., PepsiCo, Chrysler Corp. and first lady Barbara Bush.

The athletic shoe marketer will spend $5 million to create and air a pro-education campaign that will be tied to its basketball, cross-training and tennis shoe lines.

The move comes as Nike and other running shoe marketers are under attack for overglamorizing the product in ads and spurring inner-city crime.

"As part of each campaign, we'll do an extra spot as a public service execution," said Liz Dolan, Nike's director of public relations.

Nike's first stay-in-school spot could break as early as July. It will feature David Robinson of the San Antonio Spurs, who promotes Nike's Force line of basketball shoes and apparel.

Nike spends $60 million a year on advertising. Wieden & Kennedy, Portland, Ore., handles creative. SFM Media, New York, buys media.

For Nike and other marketers, media dollars spent on public service advertising can do double duty, increasing awareness of the company's products and providing a positive public relations push.

"Literacy is a major problem in the country, and we thought we might have an impact," said John Meadows, Coors' director of community relations. "It is a recognition that we care about an issue and have done something about it."

Coors will spend $40 million on advertising over the next five years to demonstrate its commitment to literacy.

A "Literacy—pass it on" campaign from the Coors Foundation for Family Literacy broke April 1 with radio, print and outdoor ads and a Hispanic campaign. The effort may expand later to include network and spot English-language TV.

GSD&M, Austin, Texas (agency for the Coors brand), is handling TV and Hispanic advertising; Coors corporate agency Evans/-Denver will do print advertising aimed at women, and UniWorld Group, New York, will do radio and outdoor advertising aimed at blacks.

Some of UniWorld's radio advertising will feature celebrities like Danny Glover, Jeffrey Osborne, Freda Payne and Vanessa Williams in 90-second "Moments

Introducing the new look of publishing in the '90s

Redesigns run rampant in the battle to hold the reader

John Pirman

By Scott Donaton

What's a Harrowsmith?
A) A tiny Canadian village known for its cheddar cheese.
B) A country lifestyle magazine.
C) A rock group.
D) A & B.

The correct answer is "D." But don't feel upset if you got it wrong—most people do.

"When you tell someone it's [a magazine] about country life," says Harrowsmith Associate Publisher Craig Neal, "it's like, 'oh, OK.' But a casual reader doesn't know what it means."

That is why the publication, launched in 1986 and named after a small, cheese-making village north of the U.S. border, will be renamed Harrowsmith Country Life with a redesigned May/June issue.

Harrowsmith is an example of just one type of magazine redesign. There are almost as many forms as there are magazines and reasons for tinkering with them (see related story below).

"Redesigns are sometimes done for a change of editorial intent," says design consultant Milton Glaser, "or because a title is faltering or not reaching the audience it's trying to reach. Sometimes, they're done because there's a change in editors. Sometimes, [the editors] just get bored and decide it's time. Like getting a new spring wardrobe."

In today's crowded, volatile magazine market, overhauls have become commonplace as publications strive to rise above the clutter.

In this environment, magazine makeovers have made the leap from last-ditch measure to everyday occurrence.

"It's becoming routine. It's like there's a clock ticking in every magazine and when the alarm rings, they redesign," says design consultant Roger Black.

Still, he adds, "while there's a little more recklessness, many editors have a better

Methods to makeovers

Five primary theories drive the urge to revamp a magazine's looks.

Culled from interviews with editors and design consultants, here's the unofficial breakdown. The five range from the relatively simple "rechristening" through the drastic "repositioning" with "design-driven," "editorial-driven" and the somewhat whimsical-sounding "change for change's sake" in between. Examples of some magazines that have undergone such changes in recent years:

Rechristening. Magazines entering a crowded field will sometimes choose a quirky name in the hope of standing out from the pack. But that strategy often backfires when the title isn't an accurate reflection of the magazine's content.

Craig Neal, associate publisher of Harrowsmith Country Life, formerly Harrowsmith, believes the new name will attract new advertisers.

"It defines the magazine more clearly and opens up to us some of the categories now being enjoyed by Country Living or Country Home: more female-oriented and service-oriented," he says.

Hippocrates, now In Health, is another rechristening designed to increase circulation and ad pages.

The health magazine's shift to a more consumer-friendly title also paved the way for the January launch of a trade magazine for physicians called Hippocrates.

Other magazines that have recently changed to clarify their editorial positions include New Choices for the Best Years, formerly 50 Plus and Savvy Woman, for-

MARCH AD RESULTS

First-quarter quagmire slows most magazines

By Scott Donaton

Magazine publishers expected a weak first quarter, and that's exactly what they got.

Magazine ad pages fell 3.5% from a year earlier to 39,339.27, due mainly to softness in the automotive and tobacco categories, the Publishers Information Bureau reported.

Still, PIB said revenues were up 1.5% to $1.5 billion.

Spending in the top 10 categories—representing 73% of all magazine ad sales—was off 1.2% to just under $1.1 billion. Automotive revenues—the largest ad category—fell 7.4% to $200.5 million. Cigarette/tobacco revenues plummeted 25.3% to $74.7 million.

R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co. cut magazine spending by an estimated 25% to $78 million this year, shifting the money to outdoor and local newspapers. At the same time, General Motors Corp. and other domestic automakers made significant cuts in their first-quarter budgets, citing slumping sales.

Of the top 100 magazines, 60 saw first-quarter ad page declines, 39 posted gains and one, Hearst Corp.'s Esquire, was flat.

TV Guide led all magazines with 802.69 ad pages, despite a 10.1% decline.

And the Murdoch Magazines title wasn't the only weekly that slumped. Business Week, 1989's ad page leader, saw pages fall 15.2% to 756.02. People carried 656.41 ad pages, down 18.4%. Sports Illustrated, with 578.68 ad pages, was off 17.8%; and New York Magazine's pages fell 16.2% to 521.15 ad pages.

The New Yorker was one of a handful of weeklies with gains, carrying 489.37 ad pages, up 7.5%. The Economist's ad pages rose 16% to 603.59.

Among newsweeklies, Time carried 529.24 ad pages, a 12.4% drop; Newsweek carried 473.48 ad pages, down 13.5%; and U.S. News & World Report's ad pages fell 10.2% to 396.24 pages.

Among business titles, every-other-weekly Forbes watched pages climb 8% to 678.93. Fortune had 624.88 ad pages, a 0.4% increase. Entrepreneur led all business monthlies with 510.73 ad pages, up 9.1%. Money carried 286.85 ad pages, up 3%. Financial World's ad pages rose 41.1% to 245.07. Inc. was flat with 236.8 ad pages, up 0.2%. Changing Times carried 163.43 ad pages, up 3.1%. Business Month carried 108.27 ad pages, up 38.8%.

No. 4 Vogue led the fashion category with 710.67 ad pages, an 8.2% drop. Elle carried 443.96 ad pages, an 11.7% decline. W's ad pages fell 8.4% to 393.59. And Harper's Bazaar, with 350.18 ad pages, was up 10.2%.

Good Housekeeping led the women's service field with 368.32 ad pages, a 6.1% increase. Other Seven Sisters titles posting gains were Ladies' Home Journal (349.35 pages, up 2.7%) and Redbook (266.47 pages, up 5.1%).

Family Circle carried 352.9 ad pages, a 19.9% decline; Woman's Day, with 331.33 ad pages, was off 22.1%; Better Homes & Gardens was down 14.5% with 274.9 ad pages; and McCall's carried 233.12 ad pages, down 9.4%.

Among other women's magazines, Cosmopolitan's ad pages fell 12.5% to 442.88, Glamour fell 11.5% to 358.71 and Mademoiselle was down 9.8% to 312.95.

Self was flat with 292.23 ad pages, down 0.6%. Working Woman was up 2.2% with 250.7 ad pages, and Working Mother was up 4.5% with 176.52 pages. New Woman carried 209.57 ad pages, down 10.5%. Savvy Woman, with 105.75 ad pages, was off 24.3%.

Parents led all parenting publications with 303.69 ad pages, down 6.6%. Parenting carried 132.77 ad pages, up 25.8%. Child was right behind with 132.47 ad pages, a 7.7% decline.

In the men's field, GQ carried 448.25 ad pages, down 4.1%, while Esquire was flat with 281.95 ad pages. Playboy's pages fell 16.7% to 163.75, but the drop-off is largely attributable to the magazine's 35th anniversary celebration last year. Penthouse carried 154.13 ad pages, up 2.2%.

In the golf category, Golf Magazine maintained its lead despite a 12.1% drop in ad pages to 395.19. Golf Digest had 356.23 ad pages, a 4.7% increase. Golf Illustrated carried 116.75 pages, up 3.3%. □

Nordbye said Titles is designed to help retailers with marketing and merchandising. The inital rate base is 100,000. A b&w page is $8,600; a color page is $11,350. National sales directors are Ned Frey and Chris Frey. Offices are at 200 Gate Five Road, Sausalito, Calif. 94965. Phone: (415) 331-1211.

'Business Philadelphia'

A monthly targeting the Philadelphia business community, Business Philadelphia makes its debut in September. The magazine is affiliated with the Greater Philadelphia Chamber of Commerce. The initial rate base is 25,000, including distribution to chamber members. A b&w page is $2,480; a color page is $3,760. Maury Levy, senior VP at Goldberg, Strunk & Levy, a Philadelphia ad agency, is editor and publisher. Offices are in the Atlantic Building, 260 S. Broad St., Philadelphia 19102. Phone: (215) 790-9966.

'Nuvo'

Indianapolis Extra introduced with a March 14 issue Nuvo, an alternative weekly designed as "a kind of Sunday paper published in the middle of the week," said Ron Tierney, editor in chief. Paid circulation is projected to reach 30,000 to 40,000 in the first year. A b&w page is $1,800; a color page is $2,160. Bill Craig is senior editor; Brian Kelley is advertising director. Offices are at 333 N. Pennsylvania St., Indianapolis 46204. Phone: (317) 637-3900. □

LAST MINUTE NEWS

Saatchi stock tumbles

LONDON—Saatchi & Saatchi Co.'s share price fell by another 29% in the 10 days ended April 27, closing at 84 pence. Six months ago, Saatchi stock was trading at 334 pence. Stockbrokers attribute the latest decline to a generally falling stock market here, lack of interest in Saatchi stock and the suspension from trading in mid-April pending refinancing of U.K. sales promotion company FKB Group (AA, April 23).

Separately, FKB plans in the next few months to close its U.S. headquarters in Stamford, Conn., as part of the company's cost-cutting efforts, said CEO Duncan Bain, who will return to FKB in London. FKB's U.S. holdings include American Consulting Corp., New York; QLM Associates, Princeton, N.J.; and other shops.

Beatrice, Unilever talking?

CHICAGO—Strong rumors were circulating in food industry circles last week that Beatrice Co. was in negotiations to be bought by consumer products giant Unilever, Crain's Chicago Business reported. The two companies had been in serious negotiations 18 months ago but were unable to reach an agreement. Sources said Beatrice would sell for roughly $3 billion, including the assumption of debt.

An Advertising Age roundup

Major consumer product marketers across the country believe reports of a media advertising recession are, to borrow from Mark Twain, "greatly exaggerated."

In an informal spot check last week by Advertising Age, marketers said they're diverting spending into new media, resisting exorbitant rate increases and monitoring spending quarter by quarter, but not cutting back on ad spending permanently.

While newspapers and magazines are taking the brunt of the damage so far, there's no sign the downturn is severe enough to be called a recession.

Worries about an ad recession grew last week as the Newspaper Advertising Bureau lowered its 1990 estimate for newspaper ad revenue growth to about 4% instead of 5.9% over last year's $32.4 billion.

That announcement came on the heels of the Publishers Information Bureau's report that first-quarter magazine ad pages dropped 3.5% from a year earlier.

Neilsen Media Research also reported the number of people watching prime-time TV during the 1989-1990 TV season declined by 1 million.

"We get concerned about the advertising situation as we see cost per thousand consumers—our real cost of advertising, not a

TV sports sales grow cold

$6B rights gamble could backfire for Big 3 networks

By John McManus

Advertiser resistance is forcing the Big 3 networks to face up to the extravagant prices they've paid to carry big-ticket sporting events.

TV sports executives see hard times ahead, likening the market to the recessionary sports economy of 1985, when advertisers withdrew millions of dollars from network sports because prices had risen too high.

Having recently gambled nearly $6 billion on the power of sports to generate ad revenues in the next four years, the networks have risked calamitous losses, industry executives say.

"The way we see it, the next two years could make 1985 look pretty good," said a senior marketing executive with one of the networks. "The network sports divisions are going to get hit hard by the high prices they paid for sports rights. You'll see cutbacks on production costs and our overhead, but that might not be enough.

"The losses will be so great that you might not even recognize network sports divisions as they are now," said the network executive. "Somebody's going to take a fall."

In 1989, before the big new rights deals, the Big 3 networks paid a total of about $550 million for Major League Baseball, the National Basketball Association, the National Football League, the National Collegiate Athletic Association basketball tournament and major college football. That year, network sports ad revenue reached $1.7 billion.

The same rights fees for next year are more than $1 billion, an 85% increase. To reach a corresponding fee-to-advertising ratio, the networks must attract $3.3 billion in sports ad revenue.

Already, the networks have time available on weekend sports telecasts through the end of September.

Perrier, other waters facing new scrutiny

By Patricia Winters

The entire bottled water industry may have to pay for Perrier's problems.

The Food & Drug Administration said last week it's scrutinizing the $2.1 billion industry's labeling claims and product quality as Perrier Group began returning its sparkling water to market in the U.S.

Perrier had pulled the product off shelves after traces of benzene, a carcinogen, were discovered in it.

The FDA has assigned field officers to gather information on domestic and imported bottled water, analyze samples for quality and "take a sharp look at labeling," said agency spokesman Emil Corwin.

State officials in New York said they too are investigating the industry. New York's Consumer Protection Board, Health Department and Senate Health Committee are looking at product quality and possible labeling issues.

"Perrier has agreed in principle to legislation to tighten up regulations for bottled water quality," said Jeff Buley, counsel to the health committee.

Company officials have said Perrier is cooperating with state and federal authorities, and welcomes high industry standards.

The industry already must comply with the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency's tap water standards and is regulated by the FDA as a food product.

"That's something we as an industry need to communicate. We've been at the forefront of regulations, and we have set tough standards for ourselves," said Ronald Davis, Perrier president-ceo and head of the International Bottled Water Association's government relations committee.

The association has said it too supports the concept of strict regulations to maintain the industry's integrity. However, more regulations could be costly and bring more negative publicity to an industry already sensitive about the Perrier issue.

The negative publicity continued last week with Perrier's reentry in New York, the first U.S. market to get the product since the global recall in February.

The state found unusually high levels of sodium in a Perrier sample and threatened to withhold its certificate of approval to sell the product, though Perrier was already in distribution to retailers.

Perrier produced other tests that proved the sample was flawed, and the relaunch began as scheduled April 26.

Weekly samples must be provided to state health officials for the next year.

The company agreed to run newspaper ads in New York state, alerting consumers to only buy Perrier packaged with the "nouveau" production label since pre-recall bottles have been spotted in some stores.

In exchange for the certificate, Perrier's Mr. Davis agreed to meet with state Sen. Michael J. Tully (R., Roslyn Heights), the Senate Health Committee's chairman, this week to discuss stricter bottled water controls.

Perrier Group is the U.S. importer of Perrier water, the nation's leading imported sparkling water.

On April 26, it held a Perrier Day promotion as planned and broke its first TV spot by Waring & LaRosa reinstating the "Earth's first soft drink" ad theme. The TV spot uses the R.O. Blechman cartoon caveman first introduced in Perrier ads in 1982.

Some grocers got caught in the certification dispute. Harold Berthold, director of grocery marketing for New York City's 27 Food Emporium supermarkets, said he had to pull Perrier from the shelves twice before getting a final OK from his Perrier distributor.

"If it doesn't come off the shelves again by Saturday, I think we're all right," he said. □

Sears tailors new ads

By Kate Fitzgerald

Sears, Roebuck & Co. is pinning its hopes of revitalizing sagging sales on a new pool of network and cable TV commercials.

The No. 1 retailer is also broadening its TV push to include more broadcast and cable options, and tailoring creative to fit specific programming and cable formats.

The No. 1 retailer's goal for the new spots—characterized as major creative departures from Sears' traditional TV advertising—is to lure people who don't normally shop at Sears, said Tom Morris, VP-marketing.

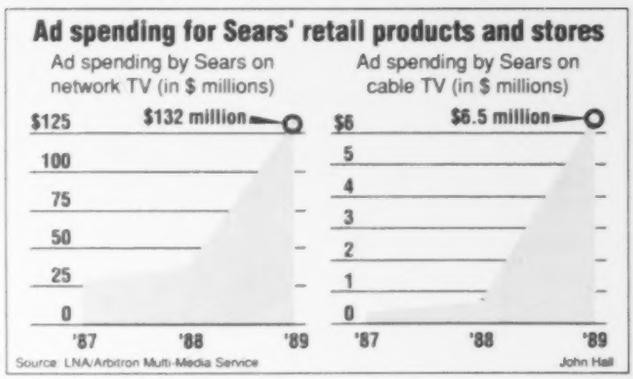
All the new spots are from Ogilvy & Mather, Chicago, several began airing in late March, and more will be cycled into the pool as they're completed, through June.

"In every new TV spot we want to surprise people—we want to show them that Sears has changed, and no matter what they thought of us before, we have what they want," Mr. Morris said.

Last year, Sears increased measured media spending 34% to $525 million as it began to overhaul its pricing format. That included increasing network TV spending in Sears Merchandise Group 244% to $132 million while increasing cable TV spending 829% to $6.5 million.

That propelled Sears to No. 4 from No. 12 among all U.S. advertisers.

Sears said it plans to maintain that level through 1990, increasing spending on certain cable TV networks.



The company has virtually abandoned image advertising in its latest TV efforts in favor of ads promoting specific brands and "power formats."

For the first time ever, Sears has designed spots to target viewers of specific prime-time network TV programs, such as ABC's "Doogie Howser, M.D.," and for individual cable networks, such as MTV: Music Television and ESPN.

"What we're doing now is matching the right creative with the right media to get the most effective outcome possible," Mr. Morris said.

Another tactic in the company's strategy is a series of 20 spots featuring one woman who systematically tackles various image problems with Sears' core female shoppers, ages 25 to 44, he said.

"My friends couldn't believe I got this at Sears," the woman confides to viewers in a recent TV spot, showing off a new dress.

The pressure for Sears to woo new, younger customers to its 847 department stores intensified sharply last week when the Sears Merchandise Group reported a loss for the first quarter.

For the quarter ended March 31, the merchandise group lost $37.4 million on 1% higher revenues of $6.8 billion, compared with net income of $33.8 million for the same period a year earlier.

Last year, Sears' first-quarter results included its heavily promoted switch to "everyday low pricing," when the company announced it would no longer hold traditional weekly sales on selected items.

When its earnings became flat in late 1989, Sears gradually returned to a revised strategy of of-

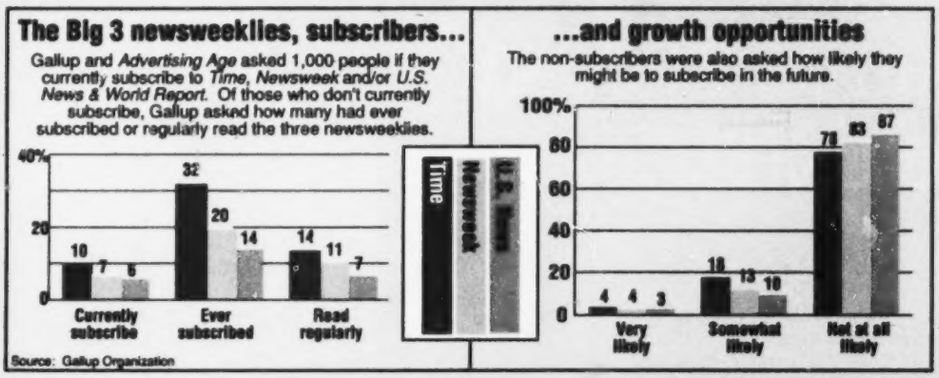
Newsweeklies eye 'likely' readers



JOHN SMITHER

By Scott Donaton

The circulation growth potential of the nation's Big 3 newsweeklies may be stronger than it appears.

A national survey conducted for Advertising Age by the Gallup Organization found 17.3% of those people who don't now subscribe to Time, Newsweek or U.S News & World Report are "very likely" or "somewhat likely" to subscribe in the future.

The findings were viewed as a positive sign by the newsweeklies, which have found circulation growth difficult to impossible in recent years as alternative news sources have proliferated.

The random, national phone survey of 1,000 adults was conducted in February. Margin of error is plus or minus 3.1%.

GALLUP SURVEY

When respondents were asked whether they subscribe to any of the three newsweeklies, 10% said they hold subscriptions to Time, 7% to Newsweek and 6% to U.S. News & World Report.

Subscribers were more likely than non-subscribers to have graduated from college and to be in professional-managerial jobs.

Thirty-two percent of those not subscribing to Time said they had done so in the past; for Newsweek and U.S. News, the rates were 20% and 14%, respectively.

The non-subscribers were then asked how likely they were to subscribe to that title in the future, and 4% indicated they were "very likely" to subscribe to Time or Newsweek compared with 3% for U.S. News.

On the surface, the figures seem to cast a dim light on the growth potential of the newsweeklies. But newsweekly executives dispute that.

Eighteen percent said they were "somewhat likely" to subscribe to Time, 13% to Newsweek and 10% to U.S. News.

Of all the current non-subscribers, a majority—82.6%—said they were "not at all likely" to subscribe to any of the magazines.

On the surface, the figures seem to cast a dim light on the growth potential of the newsweeklies. But newsweekly executives dispute that.

Although the newsweeklies are considered mass-market magazines, they're in some ways aimed at a specific audience. A large chunk of the magazines' circulation comes from college-educated adults with an interest in world events.

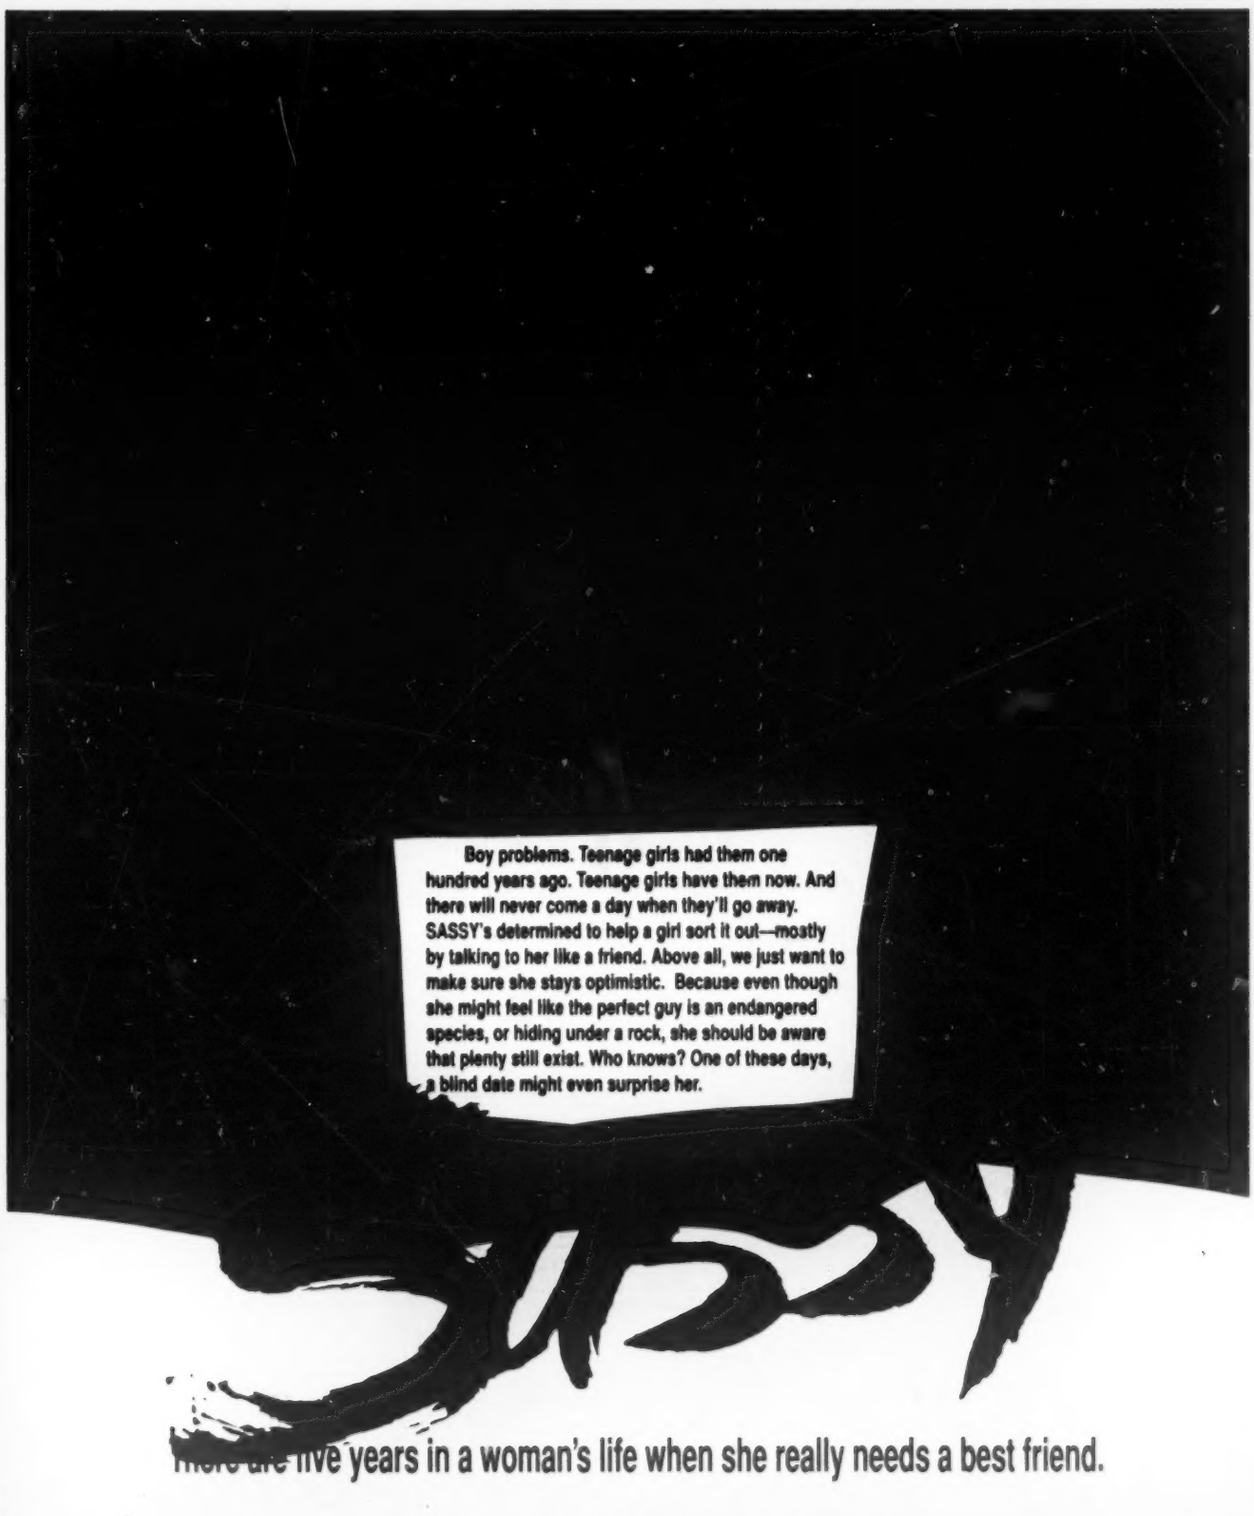
And, as a result, "the fact that 78% [of non-Time subscribers surveyed] have no interest in subscribing to Time doesn't surprise me," said Richard Heinemann, associate publisher-advertising sales director for Time.

In fact, he said, it's encouraging that 22% of those surveyed said they're somewhat or very likely to subscribe again in the future.

Time currently boasts 4 million subscribers, vs. Newsweek's 3 million and U.S. News' 2 million-plus.

"Far from being a negative picture for the newsweeklies, this is a good sign of the strength of the category," said Peter Eldredge, U.S. publisher of Newsweek. "Between those very likely and those somewhat likely to subscribe, there's a very good picture."

"That's a very large base of potential subscribers," said Jake Winebaum, senior VP-marketing at U.S. News & World Report. "It proves [newsweeklies] are not at all saturated. It's just a matter of reaching out to those people, and that's our challenge." □



Boy problems. Teenage girls had them one hundred years ago. Teenage girls have them now. And there will never come a day when they'll go away. SASSY's determined to help a girl sort it out—mostly by talking to her like a friend. Above all, we just want to make sure she stays optimistic. Because even though she might feel like the perfect guy is an endangered species, or hiding under a rock, she should be aware that plenty still exist. Who knows? One of these days, a blind date might even surprise her.

SALES PROMOTION AGENCY REPORT

Retailers force promotion growth

National programs cool in favor of local efforts as revenues race upward

By Kenneth Wylie

Promotion agencies, faced with a slumping national economy, homed in on local-market efforts to push gross revenues to $637 million in 1989, up 17.4% from the prior year, according to Advertising Age's third annual Sales Promotion Agency Report.

The report, a survey of 90 top U.S. promotion agencies, found retailers at the core of the major trends reshaping the business—particularly local-market and account-specific programs.

Another major development is that marketers increasingly are signing promotion agencies on a fee basis for longer-term planning.

The industry's growth rate continued to outpace that of traditional media advertising. Advertising agencies, whose billings are dominated by media expenditures, grew only 6.9% in 1989, according to the Ad Age Agency Income Report in March.

Little wonder ad agencies are turning to sales promotion for growth.

Some 176 of the 500 leading ad agencies responding to the Agency Income Report claimed sales promotion gross revenues of $207 million, a 17% year-to-year increase. (see chart on Page S-3)

When added to revenues of the 90 sales promotion agencies monitored in this report, that brings total U.S. sales promotion activity to $844 million.

While this is the bulk of sales promotion work handled by major promotion agencies or ad agency units, considerable activity remains in the hands of in-house units of large advertisers.

Claiming the top spot among sales promotion agencies for the second year in a row was D.L. Blair Corp., Garden City, N.Y. Its gross revenues of $25.7 million, up 6.2%, outdistanced runner-up Alcone Promotion, Irvine, Calif., at $23.7 million, and No. 3 Frankel & Co., Chicago, at $23.2 million.

These agencies were ranked among 80 sales promotion agencies whose revenue streams came largely from staff-time fees related to strategic, creative and conceptual services.

Ten agencies in the report were identified as marketing services agencies because of their emphasis on a particular marketing service.

DCI Marketing, Milwaukee, headed the group with 1989 gross revenues of $54.7 million, down 0.2% from the prior year. Wallace Cos., Birmingham, Ala., finished a distant second at $22.8 million, up 30%.

Among ad agencies with sales promotion billings, BBDO Worldwide and DDB Needham Worldwide, both New York-based units of Omnicom Group, led with $217.3 million and $162.5 million in billings, re-

Notes: Dollars are in thousands. Rankings for sales promotion and marketing services agencies are based on agency gross revenues, defined as billings to clients less outside costs. Outside costs include printed material, original or photographic art, or mechanical and reproductive art, consultants and free-lancers fees. Gross revenues don't include pass-through dollars. Abbreviations used in leading service column: coll-collateral, com-computers, cons-consulting, coup-coupon, ff-field services & fulfillment, lic-licensing, mdse-merchandise, p.o.p.-point of purchase, prntg-printing, prem-premiums, swps-sweepstaks & games, trvl-travel programs.
✓ indicates that the agency received signature of an independent accountant verifying figures supplied to AA.

Notes: Dollars are billings in thousands. NR indicates agency not ranked. Initials in parentheses indicate the parent company in which the subsidiaries' figures are included.

Chart methodology

The leading advertising agencies generated more than $1.38 billion in sales promotion billings in 1989, up an estimated 15% over the prior year, according to an Advertising Age survey.

Growth from the 176 agencies in the study is attributed to stepped-up activity from existing sales promotion units, because agencies reporting sales promotion totals for both years had growth of 14%. There were 31 agencies on the list that formed startup operations in sales promotion in 1989.

Billings for this chart were supplied by ad agencies reporting their billings breakdown by media for the Advertising Age Agency Income Report, published March 26. Sales promotion billings for these agencies represent an aggregate of their point-of-sale, free standing inserts, sales promotion programs and special events expenditures.

The agency billings volume—equivalent to about $297 million in gross revenues—boosted total sales promotion activity reported in this issue to $844 million gross revenue. Most of the total—$837 million—came from sales promotion and marketing services agencies surveyed separately (see Page S-2).

While this chart shows ad agencies controlling about one fourth of the sales promotion dollars, they actually account for about one-third, because many of the highest ranked sales promotion agencies are subsidiaries of advertising agencies.

Subsidiaries that generated most of their revenues from sales promotion are ranked on the sales promotion agency chart. Their totals were omitted from the agency parent in this chart.

Only parent agencies are ranked. Subsidiary agencies which aren't sales promotion agencies but have sales promotion billings aren't ranked because their totals are included in the parent.

Their listing contains an "NR" in the ranked column. The parents of those subsidiaries are identified in parentheses after their headquarter city.

However, if an ad agency's sales promotion subsidiary appears on another chart in this report and its gross revenue totals are virtually 100% of the parent's sales promotion totals, the parent does not appear on this chart. This is to avoid duplicating sales promotion revenues.

Virtually all of D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles' sales promotion totals, for example, are from its two subsidiaries, Clarion Marketing & Communications and Intergroup Marketing & Promotions. Because both are ranked among the sales promotion and marketing services agencies, DMB&B is not present on this chart.

How data were compiled

The diversity of sales promotion agencies makes ranking the industry seem almost arbitrary.

Some are full service in the traditional ad agency sense, offering strategic planning and concept development with a panoply of creative services. Others are "suppliers"—heavy on a particular sales promotion technique but light on client planning. A good many occupy the middle ground.

Advertising Age's solution to the tiering in the industry was to divide the industry into three groups: sales promotion agencies, marketing services agencies and ad agencies with sales promotion billings.

Agencies qualify for the sales promotion ranking if they draw at least 40% of their revenues in staff-time fees from strategic planning and concept development and art physical production. They can draw a smaller percentage from such fees, but services must be numerous and balanced.

The lead agency in this group, D.L. Blair Corp., earns 29% of its revenues from staff-time fees, but its sales promotion disciplines are broadly based—24.5% of revenues from sweepstakes and games, 4.5% from field services, 17% from direct marketing, 7% from research and incentive programs, 18% from commissions and markups.

Marketing services companies are agencies with a bias in one or two sales promotion specialties. A number of these agencies are suppliers to other sales promotion agencies. Heading this list is DCI Marketing, Milwaukee, which gleans 25% of its revenues from staff-time fees, but 49% of its total business is point of sale—merchandising, some for other sales promotion agencies.

Information on ad agencies ranked by their sales promotion billings on Page S-3 was obtained from questionnaires used in compiling the Advertising Age Agency Income Report, published March 26. (See Page S-3 for methodology.)

Ad agency sales promotion billings divided by 6.67 equals fee income, which is equivalent to gross revenues reported by sales promotion agencies. Ad agencies in general are paid in fees for sales promotion activity. Because billings are an agency size barometer, ad agencies convert fees to billings by multiplying fees by 6.67. This treats fees as the 15% media commission and billings as the media volume bought.

Sales promotion and marketing services agencies surveyed in this report responded to an Ad Age questionnaire. In many cases, agencies were contacted for further data or clarification. Some 54% of the forms contained a signature of an independent accountant confirming the numbers reported.

Listen To Hear If You've Won $500.00!

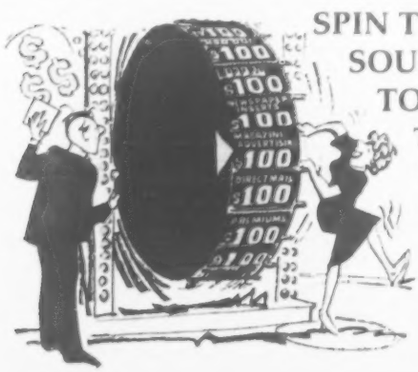
Your Advertising Will Command Attention And Your Premiums Will Be Valued By Your Customers, When You Include Soundsheets

You just can't find a more cost effective way to command attention and to generate action than with Eva-Tone Soundsheets. Use them as premiums, in direct mail or as inserts in magazines or newspapers, and they'll keep on selling for you long after other "attention getters" have been lost or tossed, and expensive pop-ups have gone flat.

Here are some great ideas that have already proven successful. And you're going to think of more!

◆ KENTUCKY FRIED CHICKEN, featuring Walter Payton: During the "Good Sound Meal Deal," consumers all over Chicagoland were offered a free-with-purchase Walter Payton Soundsheet from their local Kentucky Fried Chicken restaurant. NW Ayer produced this point-of-purchase premium for the Chicagoland Association of Kentucky Fried Chicken Restaurants. The Soundsheet was packaged in a full-color sleeve printed by Eva-Tone.

◆ TRUMP CASTLE CASINO RESORT, featuring Dolly Parton: A direct mail Soundsheet pocket folder was the medium chosen by this Atlantic City, New Jersey, casino to promote Dolly Parton's special guest appearance. Creative Director Jack Breslin, Art Director Dave Drotleff and Executive Director Jeanine Repa conceived and created this complete package. Eva-Tone manufactured, printed and mailed – all from one location.



SPIN THAT SOUNDSHEET TO HEAR IF YOU'VE WON $500.00!

There's a lot more to the Eva-Tone story — plus a chance for you to win $500.00! Just listen to the attached Soundsheet. You'll hear plenty of exciting ideas that will start your creative juices flowing — and you just may hear that you're $500.00 richer! Please, only one name per winning Soundsheet. You must claim your prize by sending your winning Soundsheet to Eva-Tone no later than the date on the enclosed Soundsheet label.

Local touch

spectively. Those totals are largely equivalent to $32.6 million and $24.3 million in gross revenues, respectively.

Retailers increasingly have become the dominant outlet for sales promotion programs.

Among five major promotion categories contributing to agency revenues—sweepstakes and games, field services and fulfillment, coupon processing, computer processing and data-base services, and in-store sampling—the latter represented the largest increase in revenues among the 90 agencies—up 26.4% to $9.3 million.

More than half of the agencies predicted trade-oriented programs would increase as a percentage of their clients' budgets in 1990. A quarter expected so-called slotting allowances to do the same, although half believed such fees marketers pay retailers for shelf space would remain constant (see chart on Page S-4).

Revenues earned from local-market activity by the 90 agencies were up 51%, rising to $96.9 million in 1989. Account-specific revenues rose 17.3% for the same period, reaching $321.1 million.

Both activities cut into national sales promotion programs—the orientation of promotion agencies for many years. And they have become increasingly expensive to administer.

"Local is up, and there will be more and more of it than traditional media advertising," says Geno B. Delfino, president of Delfino Marketing & Communications, Valhalla, N.Y. "They [clients] see quick action, which they can't see from media exposure," he adds.

"The retailers are demanding it [local marketing]," says Richard Klein, president of R.P. Klein Associates, New York, an agency whose local-market promotion contributed 30% of its revenues in 1989, up from 20% the year before.

Mr. Klein also feels the impact of demands by retailers for account-specific programs, those geared to an individual chain or a local section of a chain.

"We worked, for example, with Lever Bros. on the Wisk [detergent] fireworks program in which Grucci Fireworks Co. would put on professional fireworks shows in local communities," he says. "The program was conducted nationally without success. But now it's regionalized with grocery chain partners, such as Winn-Dixie, and it's working well."

The Ad Age report found a renewed interest in local-level special events of all kinds, including parades, music and sports.

Greater localization of the business is funneling more business to the promotion agency nemesis—the ad agencies that, unlike the more nationally-oriented promotion shops, already are in the markets or have the financial resources to be there.

Ad agencies and marketing services companies have moved deeply into the heart of the promotion industry via acquisitions. Now owned by ad agency giants: No. 4 Cato Johnson, a subsidiary of Young & Rubicam; No. 5 Clarion Marketing & Communications and No. 7 marketing services agency Intergroup Marketing & Promotions, both owned by D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles; No. 6 in marketing services Beaumont-Bennett, owned by Grey Advertising; and No. 13 Impact, a part of Foote, Cone & Belding Communications.

FKB International, London, a marketing services company, expanded its sales promotion holdings in the U.S. to include No. 7 Saugatuck/FKB, No. 10 American Consulting Corp., No. 18 QLM Associates and No. 51 Louis London.

This past year, London-based Doctus acquired No. 41 Promotion Group and Wallace Cos.; WPP Group picked up No. 29 Promotional Campaigns through the acquisition of Ogilvy Group; Ketchum Communications, Pittsburgh, purchased No. 27 William A. Robinson Inc., Chicago; and RSCG Group, Paris, bought KLP and its sales promotion unit, No. 6 Comart-KLP.

Ad agencies treading on the sales promotion domain are viewed as a threat by Grahame R. Hopkins, president-creative director of No. 33 Strategic Promotions, Dallas.

"Advertising agencies are selling themselves as sales promotion specialists. This will lead to their failure and give the industry a black eye," he says.

"As agencies push to get business, they will do more and more free spec to get the account," laments Frederick Siebel, chairman of No. 15 Siebel/Mohr, New York.

Method of payment was perhaps on the minds of most respondents in this Ad Age report, most of whom want broader planning and longer-term, retainer-based relationships with their clients.

Evidence of a change in that direction is appearing.

The percentage of revenue coming from strategic, creative and conceptual planning and execution in 1989 grew 28.3% to $218.6 million, or 34.3% of the total promotion revenues of the 90 sales promotion/-marketing services companies.

In the same vein, commissions—compensation based on individual services and projects—fell as a percentage of total agency revenues, to 14.1% from 14.6% a year earlier. In volume terms, commissions grew 13.2% in 1989 to $120.6 million.

It may not come as a surprise to those laboring in the promotion vineyards that fewer people did more work in 1989 than in '88.

Total offices among the 90 agencies jumped to 334 from 146—probably in response to more localized marketing—but the number of employees advanced only 0.87% to 4,734.

And what about future growth?

These industry leaders predict a 20% growth in revenue, on average, for this year. □

The lines are blurring

As promotion and direct response mix, big shops see opening

By Scott Hume

QLM Associates' "Succeed in the banking jungle" promotion for Citibank Arizona starts with a mailing of game cards to bank customers. Flair Communications kicks off its promotion for G. Heileman Brewing's title sponsorship of the Old Style Marathon/Chicago with a mailing to 60,000 potential runners.

With "targeting" and "efficiency" at the center of every advertising and marketing program, promotion agencies increasingly are using direct marketing in consumer promotion programs.

And that's stirring a conflict that must be resolved in the 1990s.

Where is the dividing line that defines sales promotion agencies and direct-marketing agencies? Will both survive as distinct disciplines through the decade? Will either be forced to add the discipline of the other to remain competitive?

Answers will likely come sooner than later as the multidisciplined ad agency continues to stalk clients of independent promotion and direct-marketing agencies.

Some advertisers already are turning to mega-agencies for sales promotion and direct marketing because of the efficiency and convenience of one-stop shopping.

Most executives on both sides of the dividing line foresee a peaceful coexistence—a scenario that serves each industry's best interests. But most also concede the line is breaking up—that the area of overlap is expanding.

"Certainly it's true that direct marketing—or at least direct mail—is a more common and more important part of promotional strategies than was true just a few years ago," says Greg Hawn, ceo of Cato Johnson Promotion Marketing's Chicago and Los Angeles offices, as well as its Cato Johnson Entertainment Marketing unit.

"But I think there's a difference between promotion firms using direct marketing as a tactic and being fully in the direct-marketing business," he says. "I think the feeling in the U.K. is that a merging of the disciplines is coming. But in the U.S., I think there are differences."

Primary among those differences is the situation Cato Johnson faces by being part of Young & Rubicam's extended family of companies, which also includes direct-marketing giant Wunderman Worldwide.

Y&R, like Foote, Cone & Belding, Ogilvy & Mather, Ketchum Communications and most other major ad agencies, has acquired distinct promotional-marketing and direct-marketing agencies. Those units are finding the line between learning from each other's specialties and cannibalizing business from an affiliate.

"In the U.S., the path is integration rather than melding—and it works," Mr. Hawn says. "Cato Johnson, Burson-Marsteller [Y&R's PR agency] and Wunderman are each separate. We don't intend to supplant Wunderman, but that doesn't keep us from tactically using direct marketing."

Joe Flanagan faces a similar situation as president of Impact, which operates alongside sister company FCB/Direct within parent Foote, Cone & Belding Communications. But he anticipates more of a European-style merger of the promotion and direct-marketing fields.

"There's still a gap between them, but by the mid-1990s I think they will be one and the same," he says. "One reason is integration. The disparity between sales promotion and direct marketing in ad agencies is gone. Promotion, direct marketing and advertising all have so much in common, and will have more, that the area of overlap is great."

Mr. Flanagan says, "the next three to four years are going to be crucial," because all three disciplines are being reshaped. How distinct each of the three legs on the marketing stool remains may be decided in that time.

If one key area of agreed-upon difference between promotion agencies and direct marketers remains, it's in data-base marketing, which uses the names generated by direct response or promotions to build continuing, long-term marketing programs.

"Data-base marketing is still [that of the direct marketers]," Mr. Flanagan says. "From a creative standpoint, the two disciplines have a great deal in common. We can design mailings; they can [incorporate promotion tactics]. But building and using data bases is where direct marketers have begun specializing, and sales promotion is still in the Dark Ages there."

Sid Liebenson, exec VP at Kobs & Draft Advertising, Chicago, a direct-marketing unit of Saatchi & Saatchi Co.'s Backer Spielvogel Bates ad agency, agrees data-base expertise will keep direct marketing a distinct discipline.

"There's no question that we're seeing direct marketers doing programs that seem to be traditional sales promotions, and vice versa," he says. "But direct response long has been a part of sales promotion's bag of tricks."

Mr. Liebenson foresees a melding of the two disciplines, but as a partnership rather than a merger.

"I think you'll see more programs that begin as a promotion and then turn into direct marketing," he says. Sales promotion will generate names, which are handed like a relay baton to the direct-marketing partner.

"Three years ago, I think everyone expected a shotgun wedding between promotion and direct marketing. People said, 'Oh, you won't be able to tell them apart,' " says William Robinson, chairman of William A. Robinson Inc., now a promotional marketing unit of Ketchum Communications. "But I don't think we've seen that wedding happen as predicted. Both have settled into their own places.

"Clearly, you see promotion using more direct marketing and vice versa, so there's that area of overlap. But not to the extent I think we both anticipated," he

The European scramble is on

By Alison Fahey and Elena Bowes

U.S. sales promotion agencies are scrambling to enter Europe, much for the same reasons U.S. advertising agencies invaded the Continent three decades ago.

They need to keep pace with domestic clients expanding internationally, remain competitive, particularly with the sales promotion units of multinational ad agencies, and hit the market while the going's good.

Europe of the '90s carries much promise. It's on the verge of becoming a more cohesive market, albeit one likely to remain heterogeneous, as trade barriers tumble within the European Community. Sales promotion agencies agree there's nothing magical about 1992, the EC's symbolic year for open trading. But agencies see a need to move quickly into the rapidly growing market. Citicorp Investment Bank estimates EC sales promotion activity is $32.4 billion—basically the same as advertising expenditures in the EC.

"Let's face it, no one really knows what we're going to find when we get there," says one agency executive. "But most of us are scrambling to get a piece of it."

Part of the reason for the race is the scarcity of entry points.

"Only one sales promotion agency of any size and value is still independent in Italy," says Roger Swann, exec VP of KLP International, London. "The same is true of Spain, Europe's hottest market."

Admission today will more likely be through joint venture or consortium for independent sales promotion shops. Acquisitions and startups will be left to the multinational ad agencies.

Advertisers, already marketing products in Europe or gearing up to tap the 320 million-plus consumer base, are driving much of the activity, much as expanding U.S. marketers spurred their ad agencies to venture abroad in the 1950s and early 1960s.

"Sales promotion agencies are saying, 'We've got to be able to tell our clients we can help them in Europe, at least by referring them to an affiliate,'" says Vincent Sottosanti, president of Council of Sales Promotion Agencies and chairman-CEO of Comart-KLP, New York.

The European connection also can benefit the U.S. agency at home. One sales promotion agency, Einson Freeman, Paramus, N.J., got clients Philip Morris Cos. and PepsiCo as a result of its link-up in the mid-1980s with London-based KLP, an international marketing services network.

"If not for that affiliate structure, we would not have qualified for that business," says Jeffrey McElnea, president of Einson, now part of WPP Group, London.

Another example is the case of Modular Marketing. Harry Kraus, president-ceo, says, "We had serious needs in helping our clients get off the ground over there."

One such client, CMP Direct, a unit of CMP Publishers, has been directed to an agency in the European consortium that New York-based Modular is forming with agencies in Paris, London and Frankfurt.

Consortium members will remain independent; members will swap business and pay each other referral fees.

Tom McCann, president of Siebel/Mohr, New York, wants to be able to say to his clients: "We can do that for you in Europe through so-and-so company." So it's seeking an affiliation arrangement.

Siebel/Mohr says a European presence would help the agency get business. For example, its biggest client, Jos. E. Seagram & Co., currently uses various promotion agencies throughout Europe.

"We, too, are exploring every avenue," said Jim Mack, president of Chicago-based Frankel & Co., a leading independent U.S. shop. Explorations include linking with independent agencies and/or mega marketing communications groups in Europe, he says.

Promotional Campaigns, a London-based sales promotion shop purchased in 1986 by Ogilvy & Mather, is looking to open new agencies in Europe by hiring nationals and then import its people "to show them our system," says Keith Bantick, founder of PC and chairman of O&M's sales promotion unit worldwide.

Since the acquisition, Promotional Campaigns has expanded into France, Holland, Germany and Spain.

On the flipside, European-based marketing-service companies have dipped into the U.S. to buy promotion agencies to tap the large U.S. market and to provide an easy conduit for U.S.-based clients served by its new U.S. affiliates to ease into the European market.

KLP, now part of RSCG Group, the French agency/marketing services combine, holds Comart-KLP, while WPP Group owns Einson Freeman. Saatchi & Saatchi Co. has Howard Marlboro Group and FKB Group owns American Consulting Corp., QLM Associates and Louis London, three agencies FKB is expected to fold under one name—Francis Killingbeck Bain, New York.

Expansion into Europe won't be for the meek, because even European agencies with strong roots have expanded slowly and with care. "It took KLP five years to build a network of agencies in France, Holland, Spain, Ireland and Scandinavia. It's a major effort for companies like Coke to send people around the world, let alone a promotion agency," says Mr. Swann. □

Targeting the Continent?

Here's a roadmap to deal with bureaucracy, regulations

By Elena Bowes

Europe is a regulatory jungle. Use professionals for advice. Let nationals make the decisions. Don't enter Europe through Germany. Such are the tips from European promotion executives for U.S. agencies looking to expand across the Atlantic.

But helpful hints aside, some wonder why the Yanks even bother. "The idea [of promotion agencies opening shops in Europe] is 20 years out of date. The market is flooded. There's no room in France, the U.K. or Spain," claims John Hooper, group chairman of Clarke Hooper Consultancies. His U.K. sales promotion agency has established alliances with leading agencies in Germany, Spain and France. The five leading promotion agencies in the U.K. have similar pacts.

"U.S. sales promotion shops would be crazy to come 3,000 miles to Europe when they have such a huge potential in their own marketplace," he says.

Perhaps. Others disagree.

"It is wrong and presumptuous to think Americans couldn't come here," argues Keith Bantick, founder of Promotional Campaigns, a unit of Ogilvy & Mather. "Any market can do with fresh input."

PC is currently bringing an American Express campaign conceived for the U.S. to Britain. And, says Mr. Bantick, "if it works in the U.K., I see no reason why it shouldn't work in Holland, France, Germany or Spain."

U.S. agencies bent on entering the market—and many are trying—could take these 10 tips from executives already on the ground:

1. Europe is not one market. U.S. promotional shops planning to treat Europe as a single market will be disappointed, say top industry executives in London. It will take years before sales promotion and direct marketing leg-

Throughout 1990, Advertising Age is featuring a series of market profiles that focus the nation's attention on cities that play a vital role in the business of marketing. These profiles analyze the particular region as to its demographics, industries, work environment and local media.

In its June 11 issue, Advertising Age will spotlight Washington, D.C.

A mix of powerful political and business organizations, the climate in D.C. is fast-paced, exciting and potentially confusing, especially for marketers unfamiliar with it. It would be easy for a newcomer to underestimate both the affluency and the opportunities that are so much a part of the Washington market.

Ad Age's profile on Washington, D.C. will provide [illegible] islation is standardized.

"I don't know whether the laws will change by 1992 or 1999," says Roger Swann, exec VP of KLP International, London. "Value-added tax varies from 8% to 52% in Europe. That's much more significant [to the European Community] than worrying about sales-promotion legislation."

2. What's acceptable in one country may be inappropriate or illegal in another. Money-off next purchase is permitted in the U.K. and Ireland, where promotional law is the most liberal, but it's definitely out in West Germany and Luxembourg, where promotional law is the most rigid. And even though free mail-ins are allowed in Spain, "you wouldn't think of doing it because it would never get there," says Mr. Hooper.

3. Get professional advice. "Americans are not imbued with a great understanding of Europe," says Mr. Swann. They "need to appoint or acquire some intelligence from an English-speaking European country to advise them on the intricacies of the European market. Like any other swamp full of alligators, I wouldn't go into it willingly. But if I had an experienced guide, I could be pursuaded to wade through it."

4. Leave implementation, translation and legal work to the local guys, says Mr. Hooper, who believes "a pan-European promotion is not a reality."

5. Look before you leap. Paul Woolf, new-business director of Promotional Campaigns, an affiliate of Ogilvy & Mather, cautions Americans to "investigate the relationships between the clients and the agency. If it's tied to a person and that person wants to retire to the south of France, the account might walk out the door."

6. Enter by consortium or joint venture. Rather than pay high prices to buy into Europe's sales promotion market, some experts recommend U.S. agencies align with top European shops.

7. Ally with agencies in France or the U.K., Europe's two most advanced sales promotion markets, then perhaps, go into Europe's developing markets like Greece, says Mr. Hooper. "Spain is very hot. But agencies there are selling for 20 times earnings, as compared with five to eight times in the U.K.," comments Mr. Swann. "Everything points to it being a boom market."

8. There are so-called coverage gaps in Belgium and Switzerland, countries so small that agencies have dismissed them. But, says Mr. Swann, "they're attractive markets because so many English-speaking multinationals are headquartered there. They could be a springboard for pan-European business."

9. Don't try to enter through Germany. It has some of Europe's most rigid sales promotion legislation.

10. Help is around the corner through the International Marketing & Promotions Association, which publishes a "European Promotional Legislation" guide that gives clients a thumbnail sketch of what is and is not allowed in each European country. The variance is great.

Also, the Point of Purchase Advertising Institute Europe, which opened in June 1989 in Paris, serves as an information exchange, provides networking opportunities and keeps abreast of EC legislation. □

SWEEPSTAKES AND GAMES: THE TIP OF THE ICEBERG.

Because there's more to sales promotion than sweepstakes and games, at Don Jagoda Associates we do more than just create and execute sweepstakes and games.

re'bates

We work with advertisers and their agencies on planning and administering refund/rebate offers. We screen and verify all responses, very painstakingly, and return cash or coupons according to the terms of the offer. We're very careful when it comes to handling other people's money.

in·cen'tives

Because we know sometimes it takes more than money to motivate sales people, brokers, distributors and dealers, we help create and implement incentive programs. We know where and how to buy the prizes that will help increase sales, within budget.

pre'mi·ums

Looking for premiums or self-liquidators? We can help you there too. Our premium buyers shop the world looking for the right items to produce the right responses.

ful·fill'ment

And, with our ever expanding facilities, we have streamlined and expanded our capabilities for fulfillment. Getting the right merchandise to the right person on time, intact, is as important as getting people to respond to your offer.

sweep'stakes

Finally, if you decide to get involved in sweepstakes and games, the most visible tip of the promotional iceberg (in five years, sweeps have almost tripled in number), our more than 28 years of experience can be invaluable. We'll help you conceptualize, administer and—through our National Judging Institute—judge your promotion. We go out of our way to help our clients avoid the myriad pitfalls that can befall the unwary promoter.

When it comes to promotion, whether it's the very visible type or the not so visible but very effective nitty gritty variety, you have our number.

HOW TO TURN $50,000 INTO $3 MILLION IN THREE MONTHS!

That's exactly what we did for a major Bank client whose $50,000 investment brought in $3,000,000 in new loans in only 3 months. And that's not all . . .

How about our Halloween display for a top-ranked candy client that got 33% more supermarket displays up, and a gain of 22% in volume over the year before.

Or an air cargo business building promotion that provoked a 26% direct response, a 15% boost in tonnage, and an award for the best cargo promotion in the world!

Promotions That Deliver

1. Finalist: Trial
Warner-Lambert Canada, via Marketing & Promotion Group, built a data base out of a sampling of Canada's teen-agers. The 116,000 phone calls made over the promotion period translated into a 15.5% participation rate in the Trident gum effort, according to the company.

2. Finalist: Image awareness
Labatt Breweries, via Aston Simbrow, aimed to build brand awareness for Labatt's Lite beer through the "Grin 'n Bear It" contest. Game cards given to bar patrons invite photos, with prizes for "winners." Labatt claims the promotion exceeded its original objectives by 43%.

3. Finalist: Traffic
Taco Bell, using agency Cato Johnson, wanted to increase the frequency of "young-adult" visits. The fast-food marketer claims double-digit traffic increases and 21 million 32-ounce soft drinks sold in a three-week period.

4. Finalist: Display
Joint effort between Procter & Gamble Co. and Hasbro Inc. used the lure of "The Night Before Christmas," through Hasbro toys, to leverage case sales of P&G's Downy and Ivory. Nearly 500,000 entries were received. The agency is Strottman Marketing.

5. Finalist: Display
Using Unger Zitelli Sletten, Ralston Purina aimed to build trade support by joining with Eastman Kodak to promote sales during "National Pet Week." The pet photo contest resulted in a tripling of display support in test markets, Ralston claims.

6. Finalist: Continuity
Trump Shuttle, using agency Communications Diversified, sought to build customer loyalty for its Club & Concierge Service. The program claims to have increased Trump Shuttle's share to 49% of markets it serves, up from 25% when it purchased the Eastern Shuttle.

7. Finalist: Usage
Pillsbury Canada, through agency Atrium Promotion Group, sought to maintain its lead position for its Green Giant canned and frozen vegetables via a three-pronged approach under the Treasure Valley theme. Company claims a 14% sales gain in a flat market.

8. Finalist: Usage
Vintners' International "Colors by Masson" promotion, handled by Siebel/Mohr, wanted to add retailer space for Masson wines and trigger impulse buying by consumers. The "paint can" packaging for the wine carafes helped the vintner hold a leading position in its category and boosted sales 50% over '88 figures.

PEOPLE TO WATCH

Development of environmentally beneficial promotions is a green but growing field.

There may be no better example both of the area's professional infancy and of its promise than the aptly-named Carol Green, the driving force behind several promotional programs involving giveaways of tree seedlings.

Ms. Green, 47, was working as a commercial real estate broker last year in Kansas City, Mo., when she opened GreenTree, a company to further her longtime interest in helping the environment.

She already has worked with several clients that any major promotional marketing agency would love to list on its roster.

Chief among them is McDonald's Corp. Ms. Green brought together the fast-food giant with Weyerhaeuser Co. and the American Forestry Association's Global ReLeaf project for a program called "Get America Growing," which distributed 1,000 seedlings at each of 362 McDonald's stores in a half-dozen test markets (AA, March 12). The program may be run nationally in 1991.

Ms. Green also has seedling-distribution programs in the works with the Boy Scouts of America and Allied Signal Corp., and she says she is talking to Major League Baseball about a national seedling giveaway.

That interest is somewhat surprising, she says, given the lack of interest she met when she first began pitching seedling-promotion ideas a year ago.

"I tried to talk several ad agencies into doing promotions with me, but I couldn't convince them of the importance of 'green marketing,' " she says. And some were just reluctant to work with a new, one-person company.

A divorced mother of two, she knew that McDonald's is an active developer of premium programs, especially targeted to children, thus making the company a primary target from the start.

Her overtures to McDonald's national agency, Leo Burnett USA, and promotion agency, Frankel & Co., were rebuffed, she says, so she started working on the company itself.

"McDonald's could enhance their corporate image while raising concern about the environment into positive action. I told them that I knew they gave away a lot of premiums and that they care about the communities [in which franchisees operate] and that they could afford to give away something worthwhile," she says.

"After several tries, I guess they decided to hear what I had to say. Two days after I made my presentation, [Senior VP-Environmental Affairs] Shelby Yastrow called to say he was flying to Kansas City with a contract."

Her introduction to promotional marketing came many years ago when she helped former husband Dick Green negotiate a contract with Charles O. Finley, then owner of baseball's Oakland A's. She and "Charlie O" hit it off, and soon she was doing PR work for the team, including developing promotions with local businesses.

Her concerns about health and environment go back even further.

"I was one of those people who would write letters to the cereal companies asking them to remove [questionable ingredients] from their products," she said. "And I'd attend state Environmental Protection Agency meetings."

The creation of GreenTree was a natural evolution for a woman who describes herself as "an environmentalist, an entrepreneur and an idea person."

"I'm trying to do promotions that present a better way for us all to live," she says. □ says.

Still, Mr. Robinson doesn't expect either discipline to gain the upper hand.

"I think the ad agencies are increasingly dominant. They're calling the shots," he says. "Companies are asking why they should spend all this money and not build brand equity. And when they say brand equity, the doorbell rings at the ad agencies.

"Agencies are ripe to take control of the synergy [among the three disciplines]."

"There have been changes on all sides," says Jim Kobs, now a principal in direct-marketing shop Kobs, Gregory & Passavant, Chicago, "but what stays the same is that the focus is on whatever moves product. The Quaker Direct program [in which Quaker is building its own data base of consumers to whom it mails coupons and special offers] is direct marketing or sales promotion or advertising depending on the emphasis you want to give it.

"General ad agencies are thinking more this way because clients want it. We'll see more programs that are in the gray area that's a bit of each. That may mean there are more direct-marketing opportunities, but not necessarily more workforce direct-marketing agencies." □

Nike leaps to top 10 in ad recall

By Kate Fitzgerald

Nike's offbeat new TV campaign for Air Jordan shoes helped catapult it onto the list of the top 10 best-recalled ads for March.

In its first appearance in the top 10, Nike tied with Chevrolet for ninth place in Advertising Age's monthly adWatch survey of overall advertising awareness. The survey was conducted in early March.

The athletic shoe marketer broke a network TV campaign in late February featuring Chicago Bulls star Michael Jordan and filmmaker Spike Lee, playing the character Mars Blackmon from his movie "She's Gotta Have It."

The campaign from Wieden & Kennedy, Portland, Ore., started during the National Basketball Association all-star game and ran extensively during the National Collegiate Athletic Association's national basketball championships.

Chrysler Corp. also made it back into the top 10 in unaided awareness after a year's absence.

It placed eighth, thanks to TV spots in which Chairman Lee Iacocca tells a roomful of executives that America is getting an inferiority complex from Japan. Bozell, New York, handles.

The cola wars continued to dominate the ad recall race in March, with Pepsi-Cola coming out ahead of Coca-Cola in the ongoing battle for the No. 1 and No. 2 spots.

Diet Coke, however, disappeared from the top 10 after a two-month stint that followed its Super Bowl ad blitz.

Ford Motor Co. and Anheuser-Busch's Budweiser and Bud Light brands held onto their respective No. 3 and No. 4 positions for the second consecutive month; general grocery advertising ranked fifth.

Nissan Motor Corp. USA's Infiniti rode again into the top 10, tying with McDonald's Corp. for sixth place. Infiniti agency Hill, Holliday, Connors, Cosmopulos, Marina del Rey, Calif., has since abandoned its "rocks and trees" campaign in favor of TV spots featuring the car.

In aided awareness in the fast-food category, Wendy's International passed Burger King Corp. to place second behind McDonald's for the first time since last October.

This spring, Burger King placed most of its media weight in children's TV to promote its Kids Club; Wendy's has been airing TV spots featuring founder R. David Thomas promoting "Super Value Meal" discounts.

McDonald's had 43.7% awareness in March followed by Wendy's with 13% and Burger King with 11.3%. Hardee's Food Systems placed fourth with 4.4% awareness and Taco Bell was fifth with 2.3%, edging out Pizza Hut, which was No. 5 in February.

In aided awareness of liquor advertising, Jim Beam returned to the top five list after a four-month hiatus, tying with Heublein's Smirnoff for third place, with 1.6% awareness. Brown-Forman Corp.'s Jack Daniel's led the category with 5.6%; Seagram's was second, with 3.7%; and Carillon Importers' Absolut slipped to fifth place, with 1.4% awareness.

AdWatch is a joint project of Ad Age and the Gallup Organization. Advertising awareness is measured by asking a nationally projectable sample to name the first advertising that comes to mind from all seen, heard or read in the previous 30 days.

Last month, 1,000 adults were polled by phone. The margin of error is plus or minus 3.1%. □

For more information, contact the Gallup Organization, 301 S. 6th St., Lincoln, Neb. 68506. Phone: (402) 489-0351.

Multiyear buys stir upfront market

By Wayne Walley and Raymond Serafin

TV's upfront buying season is in turmoil, as major advertisers press for multiyear deals and the Big 3 networks battle with buyers over ratings guarantees for next fall's shows.

AT&T Co., Chrysler Corp. and Procter & Gamble Co. are believed to be considering multiyear, multi-daypart deals with the networks. The reason: They want to try to hedge against likely price increases coupled with potential network ratings erosion.

Those major marketers are following the lead of General Motors Corp., which last week combined ad time on sports with prime-time programming in a three-year, $750 million deal with NBC.

The package gives GM first rights to attractive prime-time and sports fare on NBC and the No. 1-rated network's half-owned cable services—Consumer News & Business Channel and SportsChannel America.

The package includes a complicated formula giving GM preferred pick of a certain number of top 10 and top 20 shows, but the two parties will agree on ratings estimates and other details as the network schedules and the advertiser's needs unfold each year.

"Advertisers can't buy these things unless the supplier wants to sell them," said Larry Hoffner, exec VP-network sales for NBC. "We are reactive to the marketplace, and now we have a prototype. We could do this with a lot of clients."

Mr. Hoffner said the deal represents the

Madonna nears Reebok deal

By Pat Sloan and Marcy Magiera

Pop star Madonna is giving product endorsements another try, this time with Reebok.

Reebok International is negotiating with the singer for an endorsement deal in which she would appear in TV spots for its lifestyle and performance shoes, sources say.

Last year, Madonna caused a major stir when she appeared in a Pepsi-Cola Co. commercial that was pulled from the air.

The singer is just starting the U.S. leg of her worldwide concert tour and also will star with Warren Beatty in Walt Disney Pictures' "Dick Tracy" film this summer.

Reebok and agency executives declined comment.

Although Madonna isn't a professional athlete, sources say, she's a fitness fanatic who over the past few years has used a personal trainer to transform a somewhat fleshy physique into a hard body. She's also a runner and could be used in advertising for cross-training products.

Madonna

It's not known how much Reebok will pay the controversial "material girl." Last year Nike had negotiated with Madonna for an endorsement deal for Side One casual shoes but couldn't agree on a price.

Pepsi reportedly paid her $5 million for its ill-fated commercial deal and the sponsorship of her 1989 tour, which was later canceled. The Pepsi spot was abruptly pulled after airing just once in

Zsa Zsa out at Dreyer's

OAKLAND, Calif.—Dreyer's Grand Ice Cream last week pulled a 30-second spot TV commercial featuring celebrity Zsa Zsa Gabor. The company said it got more than 300 consumer complaints about Ms. Gabor in the three weeks the spot ran. The commercial, created by Crawford/Wu Films, San Francisco, broke last month and was part of Dreyer's "Unbelievable spokesperson for an unbelievable product" campaign for Dreyer's Grand Light and Edy's Grand Light frozen desserts. Dreyer's began the campaign in 1987 and that year yanked a spot featuring Watergate conspirator John D. Ehrlichman.

Tax shocker in N.Y.

Magazines, PR may have to pay

By Scott Donaton and Gary Levin

NEW YORK—Magazine publishers threatened legal action and public relations executives said they might move their businesses if an extension of New York state's 4% sales tax is approved.

Officials of the two industries lobbied furiously against the surprise proposal, introduced just last week.

The plan would extend the tax to magazine sales and to certain service industries.

The overall tax package is part of the state's budget being debated in Albany. New York is past the deadline for passing its budget. Legislators were expected to continue working on the budget over the weekend.

At press time, there remained a slim chance that the sales tax measures could be dropped from the overall budget bill and replaced by income tax surcharges.

Publishers and PR executives traveled to Albany and barraged Gov. Mario Cuomo's office with letters and phone calls.

Unlike the advertising industry, which earlier this year lobbied successfully against a plan to extend the sales tax to advertising, the magazine and PR industries were caught off-guard by the proposal.

"I think most people were surprised," said Burson-Marsteller President James Dowling. "I checked with a number of our colleagues, and they didn't have a clue. We weren't prepared for this."

"They hit us quickly," said Donald Kummerfeld, president of the Magazine Publishers of America. "But we're fighting it with calls, letter, lobbying efforts—everything we've got."

Mr. Kummerfeld labeled the bill "unconstitutional" because it discriminates between magazines and newspapers.

"We will, of course, challenge it in the courts," he said. "We would submit a suit the first day it became effective."

"This kind of selective taxation of the press has been considered and rejected by the U.S. Supreme Court in two recent cases," Peter Diamandis, MPA chairman and president of Diamandis Communications Inc., wrote in a letter to Gov. Cuomo. "Both cases involved sales taxes singling out particular kinds of publications for taxation, and the court ruled that such dis-

Saatchi veterans out

By Laurel Wentz

LONDON—Saatchi & Saatchi Co. Chief Executive Robert Louis-Dreyfus asserted his power May 4 by making a take-it-or-leave-it offer to two top executives.

And they said leave it.

Roy Warman, 44, who helped found the agency in 1970, and Terry Bannister, 42, who joined two years later, left following weeks of negotiation about their continuing role with the company.

Messrs. Warman and Bannister, who had worked closely with Maurice and Charles Saatchi, were joint chief operating officers.

Mr. Louis-Dreyfus wanted to change their responsibility for overseeing Saatchi's communications businesses, reportedly wanting to give them jobs with lesser authority and responsibility for specific companies only.

"We were looking for an opportunity to continue to work together as a team and the ability to continue to take an overview from a central position," Mr. Bannister said Friday night.

Mr. Louis-Dreyfus said in a statement released late Friday afternoon: "I am sorry to see them go, but following the decision to redeploy as much of the central talent as possible within the operations, no role could be found for Roy and Terry that satisfied them."

Terry Bannister (l.) and Roy Warman during a recent Ad Age interview.

A third Saatchi executive, Deputy Chairman Jeremy Sinclair, will remain and assume responsibility for Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising Worldwide. Mr. Sinclair, a former copywriter who's spent his entire career at Saatchi, is extremely close to Charles Saatchi, a possible factor in his remaining.

"I think it was important for him to get rid of some bodies," a source said, referring to the pressure on Mr. Louis-Dreyfus to turn Saatchi around.

Mr. Bannister said they have not yet thought about what they might do next but are likely to continue to work as a team.

"When you've spend 18 years and 20 years, respectively, [at Saatchi] and it wasn't part of your plan to leave the company, it's very difficult to plan an alternative," he said. "We're considering our options."

Other sources said the duo might start their own company, perhaps in an area other than advertising. Last week, U.K. trade publication Marketing Week estimated each of them could be in line for severance pay of about $1.6 million.

Separately, analysts agreed Saatchi's financial problems won't force a sale of the Backer Spielvogel Bates Worldwide unit to former Ted Bates Worldwide Chairman Robert Jacoby.

Mr. Jacoby, who said he'd like to buy the unit, last week said if Saatchi was unwilling to sell or if he couldn't raise the money by June 1, he'd give up his effort.

In a staff memo, Chairman-CEO Carl Spielvogel insisted the unit "will not be sold to Mr. Jacoby or anyone else." □

'National' scales back locally

By Scott Donaton

The National sports daily is scaling back its ambitious plans for localized sports coverage in favor of a national approach.

Before its launch, The National executives said local sports coverage would be key to its success given the average fan's loyalty to local teams. Launch plans called for a core national section wrapped by a 12-page local section in each market.

But producing 12-page sections for each market turned out to be "a logistical and technical nightmare," said one editorial staffer familiar with the tabloid's plans. "Everyone realized the grand plan of having a local section for each area was not going to work."

Now the local sections will probably be reduced to two to three pages. Also, new bureaus will be staffed with fewer reporters than originally planned.

Frank Deford, the newspaper's editor, said some minor editorial changes are in the works as a result of a series of focus groups conducted with readers. Those changes will include a move toward nationalizing the tabloid, he said.

"It is a more national product now than it was six weeks ago, and we'll continue in that vein," Mr. Deford said. "We're not going to avoid local sports, but we will not feel obligated to cover the New York teams if there's hotter news."

Mr. Deford said most readers get local sports news from local daily newspapers, TV and radio.

"We noticed the Tyson fight and the NCAAs were what people were turning to us for and what we did best," he said.

Twelve weeks after its launch, The National is admittedly experiencing growing pains, and Ad Director Pete Spina said he's unveiling several new programs designed to boost advertiser support.

For example, Philip Morris USA was the sole advertiser in the May 6 edition, the first time an issue was sold to a single advertiser. Philip Morris ran six ad pages for its various tobacco products for an undisclosed cost.

"That's something we're going

Circulation up at most papers on top 100 list

By Ira Teinowitz

Newspaper publishers got a pleasant surprise last week when figures from the Audit Bureau of Circulations showed circulations increasing.

Of the top 100 newspapers, only 21 were down, a good sign considering all the negative reports coming out of the American Newspaper Publishers Association meeting in California last month. The gloomy tone of that meeting was set after the Newspaper Advertising Bureau announced newspaper revenues weren't going to grow in 1990 as much as in previous years.

But now the Audit Bureau report shows that some of the biggest papers in the country are on the list of circulation gainers. Among them are the Los Angeles Times, up 8.1% daily to 1,210,077 and 5.7% Sunday to 1,504,540. USA Today jumped 3.8% (as adjusted for weekday circulation) to 1,460,494 and the Houston Chronicle grew 5.1% to 449,755 daily and 6.0% to 620,752 Sunday.

Losses by the New York Daily News and the Los Angeles Times's gains (some of which followed last November's folding of the Los Angeles Herald-Examiner) moved the Times ahead of the News in circulation.

Only in New York and Chicago did bad news for papers in the nation's top 20 surface. Both the Daily News and New York Post showed decreases. In Chicago, the Chicago Sun-Times also posted another decline.

Only in New York and Chicago did bad news for papers in the nation's top 20 surface.

The positive figures, covering the six-month period ended March 31 compared with the same period last year, are somewhat diluted by the inclusion of the first results following major changes in the Detroit, Kansas City, Mo., and Dallas newspapers.

In Detroit, a joint operating agreement between two competing papers, Gannett Co.'s all-day The Detroit News and Knight-Ridder's morning Detroit Free Press, took effect Nov. 27, 1989. As a result, the News became an afternoon paper and on Saturday and Sunday was combined with the Free Press.

On Dec. 9, both papers raised their prices to 25¢ daily and $1 for the combined Sunday paper. The News had been 15¢ and the Free Press had been 20¢. The individual Sunday papers had been 75¢. A boost in home delivery prices also took effect Jan. 1.

The new Free Press reported a post-merger daily circulation of 639,767, up slightly from the 638,776 figure from Oct. 1 through the merger date. A year ago, the paper reported a circulation of 629,275 for the same period.

The News reported its post-merger daily circulation as 526,147, down from 691,611 from Oct. 1 through the merger date. A year ago, it reported a circulation of 676,025.

Alan Lenhoff, director of special projects for the Detroit Newspaper Agency, which oversees the two papers' joint departments, said most of the News' loss was in areas farthest from Detroit, which the paper had difficulty reaching because of its new afternoon publication time.

The Detroit News & Free Press, born of the merger, reported its first Sunday circulation as 1,270,420. The Sunday News edition had a circulation of 845,853 and the Sunday Free Press of 684,527 immediately before the merger.

In Kansas City, Capital Cities/ABC dropped its evening The Kansas City Star March 1 to focus on the morning product, formerly the The Kansas City Times and now carrying The Kansas City Star name.

With the switch, the new morning Star saw circulation of 300,208, up from the Times' 275,665 circulation for the period from Oct. 1 to March 1. But that's down 132,712 from the 432,920 combined circulations of the Times and the afternoon Star (whose circulation was 157,255).

Publisher James H. Hale said one reason for the combination was the unusually high level of readership duplication of the two papers and advertisers' unwillingness to pay twice to reach the same readers.

"We had the highest duplication of anybody in the country," he said, noting that was a historical accident stemming from attempts by independent distributors to retain afternoon circulation. In some areas, morning readers could take afternoon editions at a minimal increase in cost, he said.

In Dallas, the numbers are the first since the Dallas Times Herald lost 26 Universal Press Syndicate features and comics to the rival The Dallas Morning News early last fall. The Times Herald is suing the Morning News and its parent, A.H. Belo Corp., over the loss, claiming the move hurt the Times Herald's circulation. That paper has been running a $10,000 weekly lottery promotion in its Sunday editions since February to boost circulation.

The Morning News reported a weekday circulation average of 389,605 (as adjusted for all days), up 5.4%, compared to the Times Herald's 222,519, up 0.2%. On Sunday, the Morning News reported circulation of 565,164, up 5.7%, while the Times Herald reported circulation of 332,449, down 0.4%.

The three biggest papers with the largest circulation losses all suggested that most of the losses were over.

The New York Daily News, seeing its daily circulation slip 4.1% to 1,180,139 and Sunday circulation drop 4.3% to 1,461,316, attributed the losses to better targeting of the local audience.

The paper's circulation in New York City and nearby suburbs hasn't changed, said Tom Iaquinta, VP-circulation. The falloff stemmed from the paper's decreased efforts in parts of New Jersey and northern New York.

"I believe these losses will begin to be less of a factor by the next report [in November] or by next year at this time," he said.

At the New York Post, where daily circulation dropped 5.7% to 504,723 vs. a year earlier, President Valerie Salembier said the falloff has slowed since last fall.

The Post reported circulation of 507,568 for the six months ended Sept. 30, 1989, a period that some argue isn't fairly compared with the six months ended March 31.

Ms. Salembier said a combination of tabloid stories like the Donald Trump affair, a second-chance lotto for lottery losers and recent editorial that has won some awards are bringing people back to the paper.

"In six months, I truly believe our numbers will show an increase," she said.

In Chicago, the Sun-Times reported circulation down 4% to 532,678 daily and down 4.8% to 566,808 Sunday.

The paper raised its daily circulation price to 35¢ from 25¢ May 1, 1989. John A. Cimaroli, VP-circulation, cited the price increase and the paper's move to take over its own circulation from independent distributors as reasons for the falloff. He said the circulation decline has slowed, falling only 0.6% since September, when the paper reported daily circulation of 535,864.

The Chicago Tribune claims the Sun-Times' daily circulation is its lowest for a March period since 1970 and gives the Tribune its greatest daily lead since 1975. □

The legacy of Benefit

Ambitious health claims head woes that befell Big G cereal

By Julie Liesse

Benefit was "the product that stepped over the line" for health claims, says Timothy Ramey, analyst with County NatWest USA.

But Steve Sanger, president of General Mills' Big G cereal division, views the controversial Benefit, a psyllium-based cereal now off the market, with a different, insider's perspective.

"It's so frustrating," he says. "What we were saying about Benefit was truthful, accurate and very complete. So if it went over the line, I have to ask, 'What line?' "

Many in the food industry think Benefit —which a year ago seemed to be the right product arriving in supermarkets at the right time—has left a case study of the pitfalls of "healthy" foods marketing.

To many, all the different aspects of the debate on the subject came to a head in the cereal's short life:

- The cereal staked the heart of its cholesterol-reducing claim on an ingredient often used in laxatives, begging the question: Food or drug?
- Introductory advertising was aggressive; some accused General Mills of employing "scare tactics" and frightening consumers. Others say ads assumed too much from consumers who ate oat bran with only a vague idea of what marketers meant by "soluble fiber" and "cholesterol reduction."
- Benefit's packaging was more aggressive than any predecessor in using the "reduce cholesterol" label, attracting the attention of state and federal regulators. For example, the Quaker Oat Bran package says, "May help reduce cholesterol."

"Benefit certainly did get regulatory attention, and that kind of attention raised all the basic questions of the current debate over health claims," Mr. Sanger says. "Benefit was a product formulated to provide a specific health benefit in addition to being a satisfying, nutritious cereal.

"And it certainly wasn't an isolated case if you're looking at it from the standpoint of food marketers finding ways to provide products that have beneficial effects—something that we'll continue doing," Mr. Sanger says.

"Benefit is an example of one that did not succeed because it did not develop strong enough consumer interest."

But Mr. Ramey says, "That huge 'reduce cholesterol' line brought all the regulatory and competitive forces down on them. From now on, everyone else will think twice about what they do, and how the regulators will act before introducing a new food product."

To claim success in the $6.9 billion ready-to-eat cereal market, a product generally has to achieve a 1% share. Benefit, Mr. Sanger says, never really exceeded 0.5%. It was in only 28% of the U.S. when discontinued in December.

General Mills "made a judgment that this product was going to be a modest seller. With eight months of information, we felt we could make a good assessment," he says.

"We thought of its introduction as a [eventual national rollout]. We were strapped for capacity and unable to introduce it more broadly. But we found we also had to restrict the potential of some of our other cereals because of it. That was another key factor in our decision to pull it.

"It's never easy to discontinue a product; we always tend to think in terms of modifying [aspects] to make the product work. But this was the appropriate decision."

Food marketing executives believe a gap in consumer education was critical to Benefit's problems.

"I don't think General Mills made any classical marketing mistakes," says Phil Lempert, editor of the Lempert Report, a food marketing newsletter. "To me, it was more a case of not understanding their consumer properly and not recognizing the nutritional-information overload [hitting] American consumers.

"Every time a new study comes out, it changes the rules. Is oat bran good for you? Is rice bran? Nobody's really listening to the consumer about how confused they really are."

Take the pulse

When Euell Gibbons began touting Grape-Nuts, you probably gave some thought to eating the cereal over cholesterol-clogged doughnuts. Stars carry a certain panache in pitching "healthy" eating; here are a few:

Michael Tucker...Doesn't he sound like a TV lawyer when he spouts, "has everything the Surgeon General recommends" in urging viewers to buy Total cereal? Talk about typecasting.

Cheryl Tiegs...Realizing that youthful model's look could age gracefully into a Sears gig, Cheryl expanded to capture the "healthy mom" crowd in Light 'N Lively yogurt spots. She seemed more likable in bathing suits.

Wilford Brimley...Want some grand fatherly advice? We can't think of any actor who comes off so convincingly as "Grandpa" in "Cocoon." For Quaker Oats and the company's Instant Quaker Oatmeal, it certainly has been the right thing to do.

Bob Kowalski...The "7-Week Cholesterol Cure" author proves he's an eloquent presenter. Quite believable, his appeal for smarter eating segues nicely into one way, eating Quaker Oat Bran cereal.

Michael Gross...Head of the Keaton clan who ended up playing second fiddle to Michael J. Fox's Alex. Well, Fox got Pepsi's millions, while Gross comes off uninspiring for what he's shilling, ConAgra's Healthy Choice.

Ad claim skeptics still bite

Consumers may doubt much of what they read on food packages, but that isn't stopping them entirely from buying products that make health claims.

An exclusive Advertising Age/Gallup Organization poll finds a majority of those surveyed doubt claims such as "reduces cholesterol" and "reduces the risk of colon cancer."

And while "low fat" was found to be the most believable health claim, one-third of respondents don't believe it.

The survey shows that 50.5% of those surveyed don't believe food products "reduce cholesterol"; 50% do not believe they "reduce the risk of colon cancer"; and 36.2% are skeptical of the "low fat" claim.

GALLUP SURVEY

The survey, based on telephone interviews with 972 people, has a margin of error of 3.2%.

Men appear to be more skeptical than women, with 54.6% of them saying they do not believe the "reduces cholesterol" claim vs. 46.6% of women.

The numbers were similar for "low fat" and "reduces risk of colon cancer" health claims.

This skepticism does not mean Americans are ignoring health and nutrition labeling—far from it.

Forty-four percent of respondents report they read all or most health and nutrition information printed on product packaging.

And despite consumer skepticism, health labeling is influencing buying decisions.

Nearly 62% of survey respondents say they are aware of grocery products and ingredients that claim to reduce cholesterol, with 29.3% of those responding yes citing oat bran.

Sixty-five percent of those who could name a product or ingredient say they buy it. The cholesterol-reducing claim's influence on buying decisions is greater among those who could name a product or ingredient as helping to lower cholesterol.

Of those who could name a brand or ingredient, 50.8% say the health claim is an important or very important factor in influencing their purchasing decision.

The Ad Age/Gallup survey results are bad news for rice bran marketers.

None of the respondents in the study cited rice bran as helping to reduce cholesterol. □

BAKED GOODS

Entenmann's sales brisk

By Charlotte Ahern

The niche Entenmann's Inc. opened with its fat-free, no-cholesterol baked goods is drawing interest from other bakers.

Giant Foods, a supermarket chain that carries the new Entenmann's line, plans to launch its own label of competing baked goods this month, says Public Affairs Coordinator Mark Roeder.

He adds that Entenmann's new line is selling better than the company's regular products.

Giant is entering a growing category: Data from Nielsen Marketing Research's ScanTrack Market Planner show sales of bread and baked goods containing no cholesterol nearly quadrupled to $3 million in fourth quarter 1989 compared with the same '88 period. The figures are based on 32 products, nearly half of which are private label.

In the same period, total sales in the bread and baked goods category grew 8.9% to $2.7 million.

Entenmann's new 12-item line of cakes, coffee cakes and cookies was initially so well-received that grocery stores had a hard time keeping the products in stock, store reps say.

"We're trying to bake every box of cake we can, but we are having a hard time keeping up with the demand of the marketplace," says Greg B. Murphy, president-ceo of Entenmann's, a subsidiary of General Foods USA. "There's

CEREAL

Rice bran entries can't touch Batman, Turtles

By Mark Bittman

Rice bran cereals appear to be off to a slow start, according to retailers.

"It's too soon to tell," says one grocery store manager. "But so far none of them is setting the world on fire."

In anticipation of several studies that were supposed to claim rice bran is more effective than oat bran in reducing serum cholesterol levels, three cereal marketers recently launched breakfast cereals featuring rice bran as a main ingredient.

But in January, when a major study funded by the Rice Council of America backfired, those marketers were left without the hype that ignited the oat bran craze.

Unlike their oat bran cousins, rice bran cereals face a tougher climb.

Until the February New England Journal of Medicine's study that stunted the oat bran rush, those cereals were aided by several positive studies that started appearing in 1984.

Sales increases reflect the positive publicity those earlier studies garnered. Nielsen Marketing Research's ScanTrack shows ready-to-eat oat bran cereals increased 70.8% to $79.2 million between the fourth quarters of 1988 and '89, while the total category grew 12.9% to $1.76 billion in that time period.

Nielsen doesn't yet have figures for rice bran cereals.

Among the new rice bran cereals is Kellogg Co.'s Kenmei Rice Bran cereal, which contains both brown rice and rice bran. It was launched in January, but Kellogg won't release sales data.

Kenmei is being positioned in advertising as part of a healthy diet. The estimated $30 million ad budget includes TV and coupon-

FROZEN DINNERS

Right Course seems to stumble

By Mark Bittman

Consumers are warming up to frozen foods on a health kick, say several grocery retailers.

ConAgra's Healthy Choice and Stouffer Foods' Right Course frozen entrees "seem to be doing pretty well," says Don Vaillancourt, VP-corporate communications for the Grand Union supermarket chain. "They sold through and we're reordering them."

According to ConAgra, Healthy Choice has grabbed more than one-third of the $600 million premium dinner market since it was introduced about a year ago.

The product's positioning is low fat, low cholesterol and low sodium, but entrees are geared to compete with other frozen foods.

"We went after the top 10 items in the frozen-food case," says Steve Van Tassel, director of marketing for Healthy Choice.

With Salisbury steak, sirloin tips, turkey breast and chicken parmigiana, Healthy Choice offers consumers food within accepted dietary guidelines—without sacrificing traditional frozen-food options, he says.

Advertising by Campbell-Mithun-Esty, Minneapolis, consists primarily of TV and print.

Stouffer's Right Course has been slower off the blocks.

Introduced nationally late last fall, the products include a bar chart that compares sodium, cholesterol and fat levels to accepted guidelines.

Stouffer's Public Affairs Manager Rox O'Hearn acknowledges that, to date, "sales have been perhaps a bit slower than we anticipated."

SALAD DRESSING

Clorox Co. and Kraft USA are pouring their efforts into making sure new reduced-fat, cholesterol-free salad dressings duplicate the success of health-oriented mayonnaise.

If Take Heart and Kraft Free—introduced nationally by those two marketers, respectively, this spring—mirror the launch of low-cholesterol and non-fat mayonnaise, the new dressings should snag nearly one-quarter of the category's $1 billion total sales, says Sandy Sullivan, a Clorox consumer information and education executive.

Illustrations by Steve Bjorkman

The marketers are tapping into a growing segment.

According to Nielsen Marketing Research's ScanTrack, fourth-quarter '89 sales of salad dressings that claim to be either low salt, "light," reduced calories or no oil increased 21.7% to $64.2 million compared with the same period in 1988.

At the same time, the total salad dressing category grew 10.9% to $219.9 million.

Ron Morrow, analyst for Smith Barney, Harris Upham & Co., says Kraft alone should expect to generate $150 million to $200 million in sales for Kraft Free's first year.

Tested last October, Kraft Free was shipped nationally in March and backed by a TV and print campaign handled by Leo Burnett USA, Chicago.

To date, it has met all sales expectations, says Roger Deromedi, VP-marketing at the Kraft been uniform eruption and explosion in every market we are in." He estimates first-year sales of more than $100 million for the 100 calories-per-serving baked goods.

Grocery retailers appear to be pleased with the results, too.

At Winn-Dixie Stores in Jacksonville, Fla., for example, the products are moving quickly off store shelves, says a grocery buyer serving northern Florida and Georgia.

The launch of Entenmann's cholesterol-free line was accepted well in the Chicago-area's Dominick's Finer Foods partly because it had good promotional support, says Richard Simpson, director of public affairs for the grocery chain.

A TV and print campaign, themed "Now you can eat cake," was created by D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles, New York.

Although sales are strong and overall response is positive, some consumers interviewed by Advertising Age say the products are too sweet.

But Kelly McCabe, a resident of Chevy Chase, Md., says sweetness is a trade-off she's willing to accept.

"The pineapple crunch cake I tried was too sweet, but it was far better than any of the other low-calorie products I've tasted," she says. □

ing; Leo Burnett USA, Chicago, is the agency.

Kenmei is the only rice bran cereal that is getting attention, says Walter Nelson, grocery manager at Stop & Shop in Fairfield, Conn. "But that's because it's Kellogg's, and they're couponing like crazy," he says.

Overall, however, the rice bran cereals have not yet taken off. "Ninja Turtles and Batman are the really hot cereals," he says.

Quaker Oats Co. is marketing rice bran in two distinctly different products. Ready-to-eat Quaker Crunchy Rice Bran is boxed and sold as cereal and Quaker Honey Crunch Rice Bran is packaged in a jar and is positioned as a topping.

"We're in the early stages of consumer awareness of rice bran," says Ron Bottrell, Quaker senior manager of corporate communications. "We viewed these as niche products to begin with."

Baver Bess Vanderwarker, Chicago, is the agency for the cereals, but neither the agency nor Mr. Bottrell was willing to discuss details.

The third major rice bran cereal launched this year is Ralston Purina Co.'s Rice Bran Options, introduced in January.

The product, a sweetened flake made of brown rice and rice bran and with oat nuggets, is supported by TV and print advertising by Centra, Ralston's in-house unit. □ budget is handled by Tatham-Laird & Kudner, Chicago.

"Right Course has had problems," says one Northeast grocery retailer. "They started off expensive [$3.39 for an entree], and now they've got a special price [two for $5]. But they still haven't picked up a lot," he says. "Their flavors are good, but they may scare people off with chicken in peanut sauce and the like."

According to Nielsen Marketing Research's ScanTrack, fourth-quarter 1989 frozen-foods sales were $5.3 billion, up 5.3% from the previous year. At the same time, frozen foods that are diet, light, low calorie, low fat or sugar-free grew 4.9%, to $378.7 million.

Neither Stouffer nor ConAgra seems to have had any trouble placing their products in freezer cases, and several retailers report sales of the products are brisk, with Healthy Choice dinners outselling the entrees-only packages from both companies. □ grocery products division.

Initial consumer acceptance of Take Heart and Kraft Free has been good, says Richard Simpson, director of public affairs for Dominick's Finer Foods, a Chicago-area retailer. Although advertising for Kraft Free began in March and ads for Take Heart won't start until later this month, both five-flavored lines are selling equally well, he adds.

Clorox last week began a national Take Heart campaign via Young & Rubicam, San Francisco. The cholesterol-free, 91%-to-97% fat-free dressings are marketed under the company's Hidden Valley Ranch label.

The target market is the same health-conscious consumer group that created an entire new category of foods, including mayonnaise, margarine and desserts.

One-third of the country's consumers bought more no-cholesterol/low-fat foods last year than the previous year, according to Clorox research. □

McD's faces U.S. slowdown

By Scott Hume

As McDonald's Corp. rolls out a new advertising theme—"Food, folks and fun"—the fun may be over for the world's largest restaurant chain in its own back yard.

The new jingle from Leo Burnett USA, Chicago, replaces "Good time. Great taste," which has run in variations for five years. The change, announced last week, comes just as McDonald's faces a list of problems longer than its menu.

The company is finally running out of room to grow in the U.S. without cannibalizing its own stores. The chain also is watching the consumer base outgrow its menu and is confronting the unfamiliar possibility that massive marketing spending isn't enough to boost U.S. sales in the face of industry saturation, lower demand and tougher competition.

More and more, McDonald's is relying on international operations. International accounts for 31% of last year's $17.3 billion in overall sales. One brokerage house suggests the figure may reach 41% by 1992.

Not even its toughest critics doubt McDonald's ability to keep overall sales growing; it's the consensus best-managed company in the foodservice industry. But maintaining growth, especially in the U.S., will be much more difficult in the 1990s than it was in the 1980s.

McDonald's domestic sales rose 5.6% to $12 billion last year, due in large part to the addition of 363 stores. But average sales for restaurants open at least one full year rose only 1.6% to $1.6 million, the chain's smallest increase in more than a decade.

Factoring out menu price increases, sales at the average McDonald's declined more than 2.5%, and Prudential-Bache Securities estimates McDonald's real per-store sales averages have fallen for seven consecutive quarters through the end of 1989.

"The theme for the next few years is going to be 'McStruggle,' " said Ron Paul, president of Technomic, a restaurant consultancy. "They're in for some rough times, and it's going to be interesting to see how they respond. They don't deny that real sales and even customer counts are down, and this is a very tough environment in which to try to change that."

McDonald's string of down quarters has come despite a more aggressive approach to
